MEMORIALS OF AFFGHANISTAN.

BY J. H. STOCQUELER.

ON the 15th of April, 1843, will be published, in one volume, the whole of the dispatches, narratives, state papers, &c. connected with the expedition to, and occupation of, Affghanistan, between the 1st of October, 1838, and the 1st October, 1842. These documents, arranged in chronological order, will be connected by a brief and succinct narrative of the operations in Affghanistan and Scinde, commencing with the assembly of the Army of the Indus at Ferozepore, and terminating with the evacuation of the former state after the restoration of the prisoners.

The object of this work is to present, at one view, the whole of the occurrences which have distinguished a most eventful period of British Indian History, and thus to facilitate the references of the student, the politician, and the soldier.

The work will be illustrated with sketches of remarkable places, striking incidents, portraits, costumes, &c. &c.

PRICE 20 RUPEES.

☞ Amongst the documents contained in this work will be found Lord Auckland's Proclamation, the despatches of Sir John Keane, General Wiltshire, General Sale, Sir Willoughby Cotton, General Pollock, General Nott, &c.; the narratives of Captain Outram's pursuit of Dost Mahomed; of Captain Gray's escape; of the destruction of the Goorkha Battalion; of Captain Ferris's escape from Pesh Bolak; of the disaster which befell Skinner's horse in the Bolan Pass; of Major Brown's defence of Kahun; of the defence of Kyelat-i-Ghilzie; of the rise and progress of the insurrection at Cabul; of the retreat from Cabul to Jelalabad, &c.; Lord Ellenborough's Proclamation, &c. &c.

Applications for the work are to be addressed to the Editor of the Englishman.

EUROPEAN AND ORIENTAL AGENCY.

MR. PARKE PITTAR

HAVING arranged the formation of an Agency, the particular object of which will be the transaction of affairs, connected with this country and Europe, begs to offer his services to the community of India, in any way they can be rendered available.

A peculiar and important feature in the Agency now established, will consist in the annual return of Mr. P. Pittar to India. Taking advantage of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Steam Vessels, he purposes re-visiting Calcutta about the latter end of every October, and returning to Europe about the middle of the following February, thus affording to persons entrusting the management of their affairs to his care, the opportunity of a personal conference and explanation of their views and intentions,—an advantage in the transaction of affairs of a complicated, or family nature, the greatness of which need not be commented upon.

A long residence in India, combined with an intimate knowledge of almost every description of manufactured article, and its various manufacturers, rendering him peculiarly fitted for the office of Agent to persons procuring their supplies or other articles, such as Table Equipages, Philosophical and Optical Instruments, Books, Maps, Sporting Apparatus, Musical Instruments, Military Equipments, Wines, &c. &c. direct from Europe, he offers them his services with every confidence that his selections will give the most perfect satisfaction, whether as regarding quality, cheapness, or adaptation to the climate; but in the execution of these commissions, a previous remittance for their full amount, or reference for payment, will invariably be required.

Every article purchased through this Agency will be most minutely examined previous to its being packed and the same care under every circumstances, taken as if persons were themselves individually present and superintending. Packages of a large size will, as usual, be shipped by fast-vessels to their destined port; but those of smaller dimensions, will, (unless otherwise instructed,) be sent through the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Office, Overland: thus enabling persons in most instances to receive their orders fully executed within four months from the date of the transmission of their instructions.

In transactions of a private and confidential nature a fair remuneration, according to circumstances, will be expected; in those of the ordinary nature of Agency Business, the Commission will be regulated by the customary rates; and for the selection, purchase and shipment of goods, a Commission of 5 per cent. on the gross amount will be charged.

Letters to the address of MR. PARKE PITTAR, EUROPEAN AND ORIENTAL AGENCY OFFICE, London, will meet with the most prompt attention.

Reference in Calcutta, R. J. Lattey, Esq. of the firm of Messrs. Lattey, Brothers and Co.

CONCENTRATED SYRUP OF SENNA,

BATHGATE AND CO.

4 and 5, Old Court House Street,

CALCUTTA.

THIS agreeable purgative, made from a recipe of the celebrated Dr. Christison, Professor of Materia Medica in the University of Edinburgh, is chiefly recommended by its facility of administration to children.

From one to two tea spoonfuls is a dose for a child according to its age, and one to two table spoonfuls for an adult according to constitution.

NOTICE.

THE Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's Steam Ship Hindostan, Captain R. Moresby, I. N. Commander, will leave Calcutta, for Suez, on the 15th August and 15th November, touching at Madras, Point de Galle and Aden, instead of the 6th July, and 14th October, as before advertised.

PROSPECTUS
THE DEPUTY MAGISTRATE'S GUIDE;

A COMPILATION, embodying within a moderate compass, the Regulations and Acts of the Government, relative to the Criminal administration of this country, with the Circular Orders and Constructions of the Regulations by the Court of Sudder Nizamut Adawlut.

The Compiler in submitting the above Prospectus, begs to remark, that he has been induced to engage in the undertaking from a desire to present a useful and cheap book to those, who are employed in the criminal department of the public service. Mr. Skipwith's "Assistant Magistrate's Guide," published some time since, is indeed useful, but its utility is necessarily circumscribed within narrow limits. It does not contain sufficient information on all subjects; and the very nature of the work presupposes the possession of the Criminal Regulations, &c. to which it is intended to serve as an Index. It is to supply this deficiency, that the compiler has undertaken to publish in one volume octavo, the Regulations, Acts, &c. mentioned above, down to the very latest date that it might be practicable to obtain, with the addition of a copious Index arranged in Alphabetical order; so that at a time, when the Government have it in contemplation to create a new order of appointments for strengthening the criminal administration of this country, the compilation now proposed to be made, might prove a useful and, in a great measure, complete manual in the hands of those, whose agency and services might be employed by the Government in the furtherance of the object they have in view.

The price of each copy will not exceed Eight Rupees.

Subscribers names will be received by Messrs. P. S. D'ROZARIO AND CO.

MONUMENT IN BOMBAY
ALL THOSE WHO PERISHED IN SCINDE AND AFFGHANISTAN DURING THE LATE CAMPAIGNS.

A PROPOSAL having been set on foot to erect a Monument IN BOMBAY to the Memory of the Officers of Her Majesty's and the Honourable Company's services, who fell in Scinde and Affghanistan during the late Campaigns—a General Meeting of the Subscribers assembled in the Town Hall on the 25th ult.—The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Calcutta in the Chair,—when the following measures were resolved to be adopted:—

1.—To open the Subscription to the Public.
2.—To extend the memorial to ALL those, OFFICERS and MEN, who perished in Scinde and Affghanistan during the late Campaigns.
3.—To erect, as a GENERAL Monument, a Church on Colabah, in which should be placed a particular Monument, or Monuments, to perpetuate the names and services of every individual.

It is hoped that the character and beneficial objects of the Monument which is contemplated, will commend it to the warm approbation of the Public; combining, as it does, permanence and protection to a most appropriate memorial, and commemorating, in a sacred building, the names of those, who, many of them, were deprived of the rites of Christian burial.

The Committee hope to erect monumental tablets for each regiment engaged, to bear the name of every commissioned officer, with the number of non-commissioned officers and privates, who perished in Scinde and Affghanistan; thus affording a lasting memorial of every individual sufferer: but, in cases where the friends of the deceased may desire to give a more particular token of their regard, it will be in their power to place any special monument they please.

A register of the names of every non-commissioned officer and private will be engrossed on vellum, and kept in the vestry of the church as a solemn record of the parties, to be open at all times to the inspection of the Public.

The proposed site (that of the present temporary building, which stands in need of immediate and extensive repair) has many advantages, being most conspicuously open to the view of every ship that enters the harbour, being within the lines of a European regiment, and adjacent to the depot of Queen's troops, by whom it is used as a Military Church. (It also affords accommodation to other residents of the Island, the majority of whom are servants of the Hon. Company in the several services.)

This noble Monument, at once National and Christian in its character, will keep constantly before their minds the estimation in which their fallen comrades were held, and the full and deep sympathy which will ever follow, even to the grave, such devoted obedience as they displayed.

Subscriptions are requested to be paid to the Bank of Bengal, to the account of the Affghan and Scinde Monument on Colabah.

GEORGE PIGOTT,
Secretary.

Colabah, April 5, 1843.

JUST published, a Memoir of the late Mr. MUNDY, of Chinsurah. To be had of Messrs. HAY and MEIK, 7, Old Court house, Calcutta. Price Rs. 3.

THE BENGALEE GOVERNMENT GAZETTE.

THE BENGALEE GOVERNMENT GAZETTE is published under the authority of Govt. every Tuesday morning, and contains, in the English and Bengalee language, the Drafts of Acts; the Acts when passed; the Constructions of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut; the Circular Orders of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut, of the Sudder Board, of the Special Commissioners, and of the Superintendent of Police; the Civil Appointments made by the Governor or Deputy Governor of Bengal, and the Appointment of Moonsiffs by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut as well as all Government Notifications of whatever kind.

The Subscription is EIGHT Rupees a year, payable in advance. Subscriptions commence on the 1st of January and 1st July, of each year. Those who may begin to subscribe to the paper at any intermediate periods are expected to take the back numbers.

Dwarkenath Tagore.—A very numerous and highly respectable company of Europeans and Natives assembled at Government House on Wednesday week to witness the presentation of the gold medal which the Court of Directors have sent out for Dwarkenath Tagore. The Deputy Governor's address, and Dwarkenath's reply,—both of which will be found among our extracts—were very appropriate. His Honour dwelt with much felicity on the proof thus afforded by the Court of Directors of their anxiety to encourage and reward the meritorious exertions of Natives in the cause of public benevolence, and we are confident his observations will carry much weight with the sound and enlightened portion of the Native community, and serve to counteract those wild denunciations of the British Government in the East, which have lately been the order of the day.

The attempts which have been made to weaken the force of the testimony which Dwarkenath Tagore bore to the excellence of the British Government in this country, appears to be singularly out of place. It proceeds on the erroneous idea that he has thereby deserted the cause of his countrymen, as though Native patriotism consisted only in abuse of the British Government. The excuse made for him is, that he meant nothing. His patriotism is thus complimented at the expense of his sincerity. But whatever opinion may be entertained of the phraseology of his reply to the Directors, it is certain that he did not give utterance to sentiments to which he was a stranger. That feeling of attachment to the British Government, which runs through his letter, was evidently the honest conviction of his own mind, formed upon a careful examination of the principles which that Government had adopted, and a comparison of them with those of the administration which preceded it. In these feelings of gratitude to England for her Indian administration, the most enlightened Natives of the country were accustomed fully to participate down to a very recent period; and we have no reason for suspecting that their opinions have undergone any change. The assertion that the Mahomedan Government was vastly superior to that of the British, as well as the furious declamations against our administration, are only of yesterday, and may be traced to causes which are not likely to be permanent. Indeed, if general report be true, the records of some of the Magistrate's Courts in the interior would account satisfactorily for some portion of the fury of this attack. Be that as it may, the circumstance we are recording is calculated to allay the feeling of acerbity which it has been attempted to infuse into the native community, and to draw closer the bonds of attachment between the Natives of India and the governing country; and we think Mr. Bird has acted judiciously in enhancing the value of the Court's testimonial by the official splendor with which the presentation of it was accompanied.

The Deputy Magistrates.—The Hurkaru says in his issue of Monday last, "It is a mistake to suppose, as the Friend of India and after him the Landholders' Society have done that the Draft of the Act for creating the office of Deputy Magistrate 'restricts the appointment to Natives of India.' True it is that the words of the Draft—'the office of Deputy Magistrate shall be open to Natives of India of any class or religious persuasion,' seem to favour the supposition, but it should be remembered, that precisely the same words were used on the creation of the office of Principal Sudder Ameen, and yet it was never thought that those words were designed to exclude all but natives from that appointment." We beg to submit to our contemporary, that he has inadvertently fallen into a grievous error of fact; and that his reasoning is therefore unsound. This is not his fault, for at the period when the Regulation of 1831 was passed, twelve years ago, he was neither connected with the Press, nor in a position to know the bearings of that enactment.

We can assure him that the words used on the creation of the office of Principal Sudder Ameen, were not only considered as having been designed to give the exclusive enjoyment of that office to Natives, but that they were actually intended to restrict the appointment to this class. The Preamble to that Regulation states, that it was desirable on general grounds to employ respectable Natives in more important trusts connected with the administration of the country. The intention of Government to confine the offices to Natives, was farther made evident by the fact that the nominees were required, previously to entering on the execution of their duties, to subscribe the solemn delaration, which the Native officers of the Court alone were required to make. If it had been intended to open the office to Christians, the Act would have directed that they should take the oath appointed for the Christian officers of Government. It was understood at the time that the new judicial offices were to be conferred exclusively on Natives; and that one or two gentlemen, not Natives, who had been employed as Sudder Ameens before the enactment, would be displaced, as a matter of course. Government was therefore constrained to provide against their removal, by a special enactment Reg. VII. 1832, Sect. 18, which runs thus, "Nothing in Sect. 13, Reg. V. 1831, shall be held to preclude the Governor General in Council from continuing in the office of Sudder Ameen, subsequently to the introduction of Reg. V. 1831, into the district, any individual, not a Native of India, who was holding the appointment at the time of the introduction of the Regulation, and all official acts performed by such individuals, before or after the promulgation of this Regulation, are declared valid, and shall be held to be good and binding." We apprehend that these three facts, viz. the phraseology of the preamble; the declaration which was to be made instead of the oath; and the specific provision for Europeans who might have continued to perform the duties of Sudder Ameen after the Act of 1831 was passed, afford unequivocal proof that Lord William's original idea was to give these offices to Natives and Natives alone; and that the expression "the office shall be open to Natives of India of any class or religious persuasion," was intended to convey those views to the public. We can strengthen this opinion by asserting that for the first year or two after the Regulation was passed, many applications were rejected on the ground that the candidates were not strictly Natives of the country. The rule was gradually relaxed. An opening was first made to admit of East Indians, and it was subsequently enlarged to admit all classes, without reference to their place of birth or descent.

We are perfectly satisfied that it was the intention of Government to admit to the proposed office of Deputy Magistrate, all men not in the Covenanted service, Hindoo, or Mahomedan, or Jew, or Christian, or Bouddist, and all men wherever born, whether in the British dominions or out of them, whether 'raised' in any of the four quarters of the old globe, or reared in the lap of the youngest daughter of the civilized world, whether owning allegiance to the Queen of England or to any of her allies—she has no enemies. The Act was intended to be most catholic in its application; and therefore did we suggest the propriety of omitting a term, which was originally used—so to speak—with a sectarian limitation, and to substitute for it one more suitable to the enlarged liberality of the present administration.

The Sudder Court at Bombay.—The Bombay Times, in several articles, has lately exposed to public animadversion a very extraordinary decision of the Sudder Court at that Presidency, which is calculated in no small degree to bring our judicial institutions into contempt.

The facts as stated are these. A Mussulman male and a Brahmun female were committed for trial to the Session Court of Ahmedabad on two charges; that of stealing property from the husband of the latter, and of adultery. The man was acquitted, and the woman convicted, of the theft. They were then tried on the charge of adultery and were both found guilty. This last offence being one against the religious obligations of the parties, the expounders of Hindoo and Mahomedan law were called on to declare the punishment ordained in their books. The Hindoo pundit declared that the Hindoo female should have her ears and nose cut off. The Mahomedan Cazee decided that the male should be stoned to death. The Sessions Judge, however, unwilling to mutilate the woman, or to stone the man, sentenced the former to imprisonment for four, and the latter, for three years, and forwarded his proceedings to the Sudder Court. Three Judges of that Court sat in deliberation on the sentences and pronounced them inadequate. They were sent back to the Sessions Judge for revision, and he augmented the punishment in no small degree, by sentencing the woman to imprisonment for fourteen years, and the man to imprisonment with hard labour for life. But the Sudder was not satisfied. It wanted blood; and so, taking the matter into its own hand, it ordered the man to be condemned at once to death, leaving the woman's sentence to be revised when the other had been executed.

It seems extraordinary that any tribunal in India, should expose itself to public indignation in this age of civilization, by ordering a man convicted of adultery to be deprived of life. It appears unaccountable that at a time when we are exulting over the abolition of the punishment of death in our own land, that punishment should be extended to crimes in India, to which it had never been awarded during our administration. Did it never occur to the Judges of that tribunal, that if their decision was not supported by the three other Courts of similar rank in India, they would be placed in a most unenviable predicament; and that if the rule they have now made were to become law, and death were to follow every conviction of adultery in India, the land would be deluged with blood? It has been affirmed in extenuation of their decision that adultery is a criminal offence in India, though only a civil transgression in England. This is as it should be. It is one of the most disgraceful anomalies in our laws, that this crime, which inflicts a degree of misery on families, infinitely greater than that occasioned by the most daring burglary, should be visited with punishment so utterly inadequate to its enormity; and which, in the case of wealthy individuals, is no punishment at all. It is advantageous to the interests of society that adultery should be repressed by being classed among criminal offences, and that the offender should be exposed to a penal sentence and not to civil damages. But is this any reason for visiting it with a sanguinary punishment which shocks the feelings equally of the Native and the European community? Government ought to have some regard to its own reputation for justice, even if it be indifferent to its character for humanity. And what will the Natives think of the justice or impartiality of our jurisprudence when they find that a Mahomedan who robs another of his wife is to be hung, while the European adulterer is let off with a trifling fine?

Passing from this individual case to the general system of our criminal jurisprudence in India, it may be asked what opinion the civilized world is likely to form of our Indian administration, when it is proclaimed that after the theory of punishments has been discussed for half a century by the ablest juris-consults in Europe, and fixed upon sound and rational principles, we should still resort to codes which direct the ears and noses of females to be cut off, and males to be stoned to death? It cannot be too often borne in mind that in the management of this empire, our conduct is not as heretofore submitted solely to the scrutiny of a close corporation in London; we are acting, in the eyes of all Europe. Thanks to Steam communication, our proceedings are examined and their character determined by half the journals of the European world even before the report of them reaches Leadenhall Street. And what judgment will Europe pass on our administration, if with all the light and knowledge of the nineteenth century, we continue unnecessarily and wantonly to incorporate in our system, the legislation of a barbarous age and a barbarous people? It is manifest that we are not bound by any pledge to administer the Hindoo and Mahomedan criminal law; for in this, as in other instances, it has been set aside. Why then should we have recourse to it at all? Simply because of the culpable supineness of the public Authorities at home. It is now nearly ten years since a Law Commission was appointed by Act of Parliament to digest a New Code of jurisprudence for all India. The earliest attention of that body was directed to the compilation of a Code of Criminal Law, which was completed nearly six years ago. Nothing has been since heard of it. It is buried in the archives of the Company, without hope of resurrection. The Edinburgh Review justly says, "The labours of this Commission have hitherto met with little encouragement from those whose duty it is to examine and give practical effect to its results." Yet that Criminal Code cost India Seven lakhs of Rupees, 70,000*l.* The country has a right to demand some return for this money. If the Code was defective, it should have been amended; if altogether worthless, something better should have been substituted for it during the six years in which that Commission has since continued to sit. To have thus thrown away the result of the labours of three years is a dereliction of public duty. The responsibility lies with the Directors at home, whose business it was to have given a practical effect to the labours of the Commission. Yet, after an expenditure of twenty lakhs of Rupees, two hundred thousand pounds sterling, our Courts are still obliged to resort for sentences in Criminal cases to Codes which it is a disgrace to acknowledge.

EXTENSION OF THE POWERS OF NATIVE JUDGES.—Government has just advanced another step in carrying out the views of Lord William Bentinck, promulgated twelve years ago, regarding the employment of Native agency in the department of Civil Justice. The caution with which the powers of Native Judges have been gradually enlarged, is deserving of much praise. In the infancy of the new system, when the Agents selected were necessarily men of inferior attainments and character, it was deemed prudent to impose various restrictions, to prevent the abuse of the power entrusted to them. At the same time the local Government has been diligently exerting itself to raise the character and the qualifications of the Native Judicial Service; and as these efforts appeared to be crowned with success, their jurisdiction has been successively enlarged and the importance of their offices greatly increased. We have now to notice another extension of their authority, in the new prerogatives conferred on them by Act VI. of the present year, of which we propose to offer our readers a very brief analysis and explanation.

The First Section directs that the Principal Sudder Ameens shall be guided in the decision of all suits by the rules established for the conduct of business in the Zillah Courts. When the office was first created, it was provided that these judges should follow the rules passed for the trial of suits by Sudder Ameens and Moonsiffs. But it was discovered that the course of justice was impeded by fettering judges entrusted with the decision of causes to the extent of 5000 Rupees, with restrictions which were applicable to suits of the value of 300 or 1000 Rs. The Principal Sudder Ameens were at the very outset entrusted with a jurisdiction equivalent to that which had previously belonged to the Zillah Judges, and it would have been more appropriate to have made all the rules regarding the trial of suits when instituted before the European judge, applicable to the trial of the same suits when transferred to a Native Judge. The limitation of powers arose doubtless from the novelty of the change, and the want of established character in the Native Judges who were appointed to this high office. These objections having now ceased, the authority of the Principal Sudder Ameens is very properly made coextensive with that which was formerly exercised by the Zillah Judges.

The Second Section supplies an omission, which ought in all reason to have been supplied six years ago. In 1837 Principal Sudder Ameens were entrusted with the cognizance of suits of any amount in excess of 5000 Rs. and it was ordered, that in suits under that amount an appeal from their decree should lie to the Zillah Judge; in suits above that sum, to the Sudder Court. By an over anxiety to prevent injustice, every interlocutory order passed during the examination, of a cause, may by law become the subject of an appeal. An opponent has thus an opportunity of impeding the progress of a suit at every stage. To these 'everlasting appeals' there are many reasonable objections, and the system admits, we think, of salutary revision; but it is the law of the land, and we shall not now stop to discuss the propriety of it. The law of 1837 which enlarged the jurisdiction of the Principal Sudder Ameens, and lodged the appeal from their decrees in suits above 5000 Rupees in the Sudder, was silent about an appeal on interlocutory orders, and these have been made to the Zillah Judges. This anomaly is now rectified. The appeal from such orders is in future to lie to the Sudder, to whom the appeal on the decree is committed.

Sections Three and Four greatly extend the powers of the Moonsiffs and Sudder Ameens, and afford greater facilities for the administration of Justice in their Courts. Under the former arrangement, if the Native Judge received information during the progress of a suit, that the defendant intended to abscond, or to make away with his property, he was not at liberty to demand security from him, for the eventual performance of the decree, or in case of his refusing to furnish it, to attach his property, without obtaining the sanction of the Judge. The defendant was not of course ignorant of any such application; and was enabled therefore to defeat the ends of justice, by absconding or disposing of his property before the Judge's reply could arrive; and he was a great simpleton if he did not avail himself of the opportunity which the law so generously afforded him. The new law vests the subordinate Judges with power to demand security, or to sequester property in all such cases, without any reference to the Judge. We are aware that the native community doesnot regard without a feeling of dismay the enlarged authority thus conferred on Native Judges, and which gives them the power of inflicting the most serious injury on a defendant by collusion with a plaintiff. That this power will in some instances be thus abused, there can be no doubt, but an appeal will lie to the Judge, and he may always repair the injustice. On the whole, the inconveniences which this increase of power may occasion, are likely to be fewer than those which it will remove; and this is a sufficient justification of the new law.

The two lower grades of Judges were also restricted under the old law from realizing, without reference to the Judge, any fines they might find it necessary to impose. By the new Act these fines may be enforced without such reference: but an appeal against the order will always lie to the Judge, who may modify or remit the fine:—a provision the more necessary as a Moonsiff is now empowered to fine a man to the extent of double his own salary; and of two-thirds the amount of the suit pending in his Court.

The Fifth Section refers to the execution of decrees. Reg. V. of 1831, Sect. 22, ordered that the decrees of the Principal Sudder Ameens should be executed by them. Perhaps this enactment was intended to apply only to the decrees passed by them in original suits, though it appears to have been construed as applying to decisions passed by them in appeal cases. This point was afterwards explained by a Circular Order, which ordained that if the decree was a mere confirmation of that of the lower Court without summoning the respondent, it should be executed by that Court. If it was passed upon a full investigation of the merits of the case, it should be executed by the Court of Appeal. The present enactment sweeps away that distinction, and provides that all decrees passed in appeal shall be executed by the Court in which the suit was originally instituted. But the Circular Order which is thus superseded, may possibly continue for months or years unrepealed, and unnecessarily embarrass the minds of the Native pleaders and Judges. We would therefore venture to recommend that the Sudder Court should issue a Circular Order on the publication of every new Act, pointing out the previous Orders which may have been superseded by it, and modifying those which require modification. This course, by removing all doubts regarding the Orders which are still to be considered in force, would tend greatly to facilitate the administration of Justice.

The sixth, seventh and eighth Sections give the Moonsiff's jurisdiction in every description of suits, and over every class of persons, provided the amount at issue be not above 300 Rs. and the cause of action has arisen within the limits of their own local jurisdiction. All Europeans are thus subjected to the Courts of the Moonsiff. The Black Act of 1836 is now consummated. That Regulation still left Europeans exempt from the jurisdiction of the Moonsiff, the lowest grade of Judges; the present Act abolishes all privileges, levels all distinctions, and, whether for good or whether for ill, gives an impartial uniformity to our jurisprudence which has hitherto been wanting. The Moonsiff may admit and try a suit against a European; he may call on him for security, if he is represented as being likely to remove from the jurisdiction, and, if it be not given, he may sequester his property; he may fine him to the extent of 200 Rupees for obstructing justice; and levy the fine upon his own order—but the Moonsiff, to whom such large powers and prerogatives are confided, is not to be trusted with the privilege of franking a single public requisition or order he may have occasion to transmit by post to another Court. An order of the Sudder Court published in last Tuesday's Bengalee Government Gazette, directs that he shall send every such requisition or order under an open envelop to the Judge, who will seal and frank the cover, and send it to the Post Office. So strange a compound of confidence and mistrust does our system of local jurisprudence in India present.

A MOST IMPORTANT QUESTION.—A correspondent has submitted to our arbitration a question of official etiquette, upon which we have not as yet been able to make up our mind. We invoke the generous aid of all and singular our readers and correspondents, who are able to shed any light upon this most important question, which threatens to interrupt the harmony of our judicial arrangements in the department of Civil justice.

A discussion has arisen, it appears, between a Moonsiff and a Civil Judge in some district subordinate to the Government of Bengal, whether a Moonsiff, in Christian habits both of mind and body, is entitled to be called Sahib. The Moonsiff claims the title; the Civil Judge refuses it; and this knotty point, instead of being submitted to the Deputy Governor of Bengal and the Upper Secretary and the Under Secretaries, is brought to the tribunal of the Press.

We are not aware that the foresight of Government has made any adequate provision against such a contingency. The Circular Order of the 6th July 1838, directs that the Moonsiff, if a Christian, shall be addressed as "Sir," and that his title shall be "Mr.;" but whether "Mr." be synonimous with Saheb, is not defined. The question therefore remains to be settled; and it can be settled only by the authority of Government, the fountain of honour.

Lest our correspondent however should imagine that in thus referring him to Mr. Bird, we are anxious to shuffle off a difficult question, we will give him the benefit, whatever it be, of our researches. It appears to be an indisputable fact, that from our first advent in India, the term Sahib has been applied to every individual of any respectability who wore a hat; we mean a round hat with a brim to it. It is questionable whether that peculiar kind of cock boat which some Armenians mount upon their heads, and which has induced the Chinese to call them "the three cornered hat devils," would entitle a man in India to the term Sahib, though it may be conceded to him, by courtesy. But the terms topee walah, or one who wears a hat, and Sahib, have for the better part of a century, been synonimous. Mr. Foster, in his translation of the Regulations for 1793, uses the word Belayutee topee wala, to designate a European, evidently intending thereby to convey the idea that there may be topee walas, or Sahibs, who were not European. And this supposition is supported by the general voice and usage of society. We believe that no native would apply the term Sahib to any man without a hat and shoes; but in no instance would he refuse this title to one who carried on his person so unequivocal an emblem of gentility. If therefore the prescriptive usages of society are to govern the decision of the Deputy Governor, when the subject is brought before him, we think the claim of the Moonsiff to the designation will be at once recognized.

To be serious however. It is far more foolish in the Judge to dispute the claim than in the Moonsiff to advance it. Every one in the district would as a matter of course give the Moonsiff the title of Sahib,—except perhaps, the Judge; and he would scarcely withhold it, except under the influence of a testy humour. The Moonsiff has therefore just reason to remonstrate against a procedure which is intended to inflict an extra-judicial stigma upon him, and is calculated to degrade him in the estimation of the suitors and officers of his own Court. The proceeding on the part of the Judge exhibits so entire a sacrifice of official dignity to personal resentment, and betrays such extreme littleness of mind as to make it very questionable whether he is fit to preside over the judicial arrangements of a large district. If the Moonsiff has committed any official delinquency, it ought to be reproved officially, and not by refusing him the title of Sahib, which can serve no other purpose than to display the Judge's antipathy to the individual. The injury he thereby inflicts on his own character will be found to be ten times greater than any he can inflict on the poor dependent Moonsiff.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CONVENT IN CALCUTTA.—An anonymous correspondent of the Englishman, last week mentioned in a letter to the Editor that Protestants had sent their children for education to the Catholic Convent in Calcutta, at the hazard of their religion. We offered a passing remark on this apparent acknowledgment, by one who appeared to be in the secret, that the religious belief of Protestant children was not altogether safe, when they were entrusted to Catholic tutors at the Nunnery. The writer has endeavoured, in a letter which will be found in a subsequent column, to qualify his representation, which was likely to startle some of the unsuspecting Protestant parents who have availed themselves of the Convent for education. He says that we have misunderstood his language; that he did not intend to affirm that there was any real hazard in sending children to the Nunnery, but simply that Protestants thought so, and chose notwithstanding to run the hazard. The reader will be pleased to bear this explanation in mind.

The Catholic Herald of Saturday last has an article on the same subject, and as many of our readers may not have had an opportunity of forming an opinion of the tone and spirit of this organ of the Catholic community in India, we have republished it entire for their information.

There is much in that communication altogether irrelevant to the matter in hand, which is simply whether Protestant children sent to the Nunnery for education are likely to leave it with their Protestant feelings unimpaired. The writer says, that in "several instances the parents and guardians of Protestant children, when placing their proteges at Loretto House, openly declared, that they had not the least objection that their wards should attend Catholic worship and instruction." We are sorry to hear that any Protestant parents or guardians are to be found who are so indifferent on a subject of such transcendant importance. We think they might with advantage take a lesson from the Catholics, who guard their children and wards, with the most rigid jealousy, from all associations likely to weaken their attachment to the Roman Catholic religion. But there are doubtless other Protestants who take a more conscientious view of their responsibilities, and who have confided their children to the Convent in the hope that their Protestant principles would not be shaken, and that they would leave the institution as free from any bias to Catholicism as they entered it. It appears sufficiently evident from the Catholic Herald that their expectations will not be realized. The writer defies us to prove a single case where either a command or a wish was intimated to a Protestant child to induce that child to attend Catholic worship. Although we had heard from various quarters, on the report of children who had been removed from the Nunnery, that very strong encouragement had been offered to them, to conform to Catholic usages, we never affirmed that their religious principles had been tampered with, and we are not therefore obliged to enter on the proof. From the very confident tone of the Catholic Herald it would appear that there was little foundation for these assertions, and that it must have been the children themselves, who were mistaken in their apprehensions. The object of our brief notice was solely to remark, on what appeared to us good evidence, that Protestant children, when entrusted to the Nunnery, run the hazard of losing their Protestant attachments, and contracting a partiality for the Catholic religion, which would end sooner or later in their embracing it. The correspondent of the Catholic Herald places this point, we think, beyond all doubt. We are told that the holy example, the endearing conduct of the Loretto Ladies must teach their pupils to reverence a religion which cherishes the virtues they daily witness, and must banish for ever from their minds, the low vulgar prejudices which have taken shelter in Serampore;—that is, the low vulgar prejudices in favour of that Christian truth and liberty which the Reformation secured to us. From whatever cause, therefore, whether from the kindness of the Ladies, or the effect of Roman Catholic ceremonials on the young imagination, children must, it appears, leave the Convent without any low and vulgar prejudices in favour of—Protestantism.

THE DUST OF THE SOMNATH GATES.—The celebrated Proclamation relative to the Somnath Gates which has been the theme of discussion in every journal in England, and even in Parliament itself, and has afforded such a fund of ridicule to Punch and the caricaturists, was gradually dying out of recollection in this country, when public attention was again called to it, by the presentation of a box of its saw dust to the Asiatic Society at the last meeting. What was thought and said and done on that occasion, the imagination of the reader will readily suggest to him. As impartial journalists, however, it becomes us to remark that the production of the box, without its accompaniments, gave the whole transaction an air of ridicule, which did not originally belong really to it. It is generally understood that a drawing of the Gates, with a copy of the inscription, and of the report of the Engineer officers who examined them, was to have been presented at the same time with the dust. Independently of the celebrity which the gates have obtained from a recent event, there is an antiquarian interest associated with them which rendered the gift of the drawing to that learned body by no means inappropriate. We have heard that the inscription furnishes considerable evidence of the identity of these gates with those which may be supposed to have adorned the temple of Somnath. The dust would have afforded an opportunity for ascertaining whether they were made of sandal wood. Nothing however was laid on the table of the Society, but a few pinches of dust put up in a kind of apothecary's box, and thus it appears that ridicule is destined to attend the unfortunate gates to the end of the Chapter.

The original design of bringing back the gates as a trophy of victory, which is mentioned in the very first letter written by the Governor General to General Nott, when he ordered the advance to Ghuzni and Cabul, was exceedingly suitable to the occasion, and calculated to produce a strong and beneficial effect on the Native mind. It had been echoed from one end of India to the other, from the Himalayu to Cape Comorin; and from the mountains of Assam to the Delta of the Indus, that the 'invincible nation' had at length encountered its match in the defiles of Affghanistan; that Ghuzni, the capture of which completed the humiliation of the Crescent, had been wrested from us; that our Envoys had been assassinated and our armies annihilated by the descendants of those who had in former ages rendered their names terrible by conquests and cruelties in India. Our disasters at Cabul became the topic of conversation among the bearded Seikh chieftains at Ladak, and the Polygars of Cape Comorin, among the Ameers of Scinde, and at the Court of Tharawaddy. In these circumstances, perhaps nothing was so likely to produce a reaction in the native mind and to assure the princes and chiefs of India, as well as those beyond its limits, that victory had returned to our standard, as the announcement that the Gates of Somnath which stood in Mahomed's tomb at Ghuzni, had been brought to India as a trophy of victory. Though the original abstraction of the gates was but little known in the community at large, the princes and chiefs, whom it was our object to convince of our triumphs, had more or less some faint perceptions on the subject; and the public notification that they were coming back to India, in the train of our returning armies would have been taken as an undoubted proof of the reality of our triumphs. The idea was originally not only good, but happy; but it was altogether spoiled, by that most unfortunate proclamation which in an evil hour the Governor General was induced to pen. The whole transaction immediately assumed an air of ridicule; and the stigma of folly was deeply fixed on the administration, which it will require years of good Government to obliterate.

INTRODUCTION OF ESCULENT ROOTS INTO INDIA.—We publish below a communication which reached us some time ago, sent by a Missionary in Africa to his friend in this country. The information it contains may be turned to good account by the Agricultural Societies in India. The existence of no fewer than thirty-two valuable esculent roots, in the deserts of Africa, which afford excellent food, and require little rain, and no culture, is an important fact. If they will grow in such untoward circumstances in Africa, they would flourish under more favourable circumstances in various parts of India. There is no more certain mode of improving the condition of the people than by multiplying the means of sustenance through the introduction of roots and plants from foreign parts. The gift of the potatoe has been a greater blessing to the lower classes of society, than that of the Permanent Settlement has been to the landed aristocracy. We are not aware of the precise year in which it was introduced, but forty years ago it was so rare, that the parent of a child who was sent to one of the first seminaries then in India stipulated that he should have potatoes three times a week in the season. The cultivation has been indefinitely extended since that time, and in the month of January, potatoes are sold in the gross at twelve annas the maund, or three pounds for a penny; and an invaluable article of food is thus given to the very poorest, during three or four months in the year.

There can be no doubt that many of the roots mentioned by the African Missionary would be found to grow well even in the soil of Bengal, during the cold season. But they would above all prove an invaluable acquisition to the newly acquired province of Scinde, especially in those parts of it which are covered with the sands of the desert. If we could thus augment the means of sustenance in that arid country, we should be indeed conferring the most solid benefit upon its inhabitants. The subject is worthy the attention of the Agricultural Societies of Bengal and Bombay. Some of their members have resorted to the Cape for the benefit of their health, and there would be little difficulty in putting them in the way of procuring and dispatching, after the most approved fashion, a number of these esculent roots to India.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

MY DEAR SIR,—The following extract is from a letter which I received the other day from a friend in Central Africa. As I am ignorant whether there be such a society as my correspondent mentions or not, I have thought the surest way of obtaining the attention of those interested in this matter would be through the medium of your columns. He writes, "I saw somewhere a notice from an Indian paper, respecting the formation of a society, if I mistake not under the patronage of Lord Auckland, for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the natives of India by introducing esculent roots, &c. from other countries. It struck me that the roots and fruits which abound in our deserts beyond this would be excellent for India. We have on the desert, where there is not a drop of water for a great part of the year, no fewer than 32 roots and 43 fruits. Some of them are excellent and form the chief food of the Bushmen and other natives of the desert. They grow on the sand without any cultivation, and if cultivated, they very probably would be improved. One root is excellent, when young, resembling a young turnip, and it produces a bean about the size of a marble which when roasted is very pleasant. You see only a slender creeping plant above the sand with a few pods containing the beans, but if you dig down a good way you may get a root as large as your thigh—and this too in the most desert places. There are several pleasant fruits too, which might be much improved by cultivation even now the flavour is excellent."

My friend is stationed at Kuruman (or Lattakoo) to the north of which these roots and fruits are principally found; respecting a gentleman through whom I had sent him a letter he says, "I wish he would come up this way," and adds, "this is an excellent climate and I believe it would do any of your Indian invalids good. If I knew any one coming I would tell him where he would be most civilly treated and where he most probably would recover his health soonest."

I am, yours truly,

B. W.

We have availed ourselves with much pleasure of a Report of the Proceedings at Bombay on laying the foundation of the Grant Medical College, to reprint almost entire, the admirable sketch of the character of the late Sir Robert Grant, given by the Bishop of Calcutta in his address. It will amply repay perusal. The interest which it is calculated to revive, is increased by the recollection that this lamented statesman and philanthropist received the first rudiments of his education in the city of Calcutta, under the Rev. David Brown.

We have received several letters from correspondents, requesting a notice of Lieut. Eyre's book. We should have attended to their wishes earlier, if we could have procured a copy of the work for ourselves; but every copy of the first importation was sold in a day or two, and we were obliged to wait for the second supply. We are now in possession of a copy we can use editorially; and shall begin with the review of it next week.

We beg to acknowledge the receipt of the following pamphlets, of which we shall lose no time in giving an analysis.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 11.

— Intelligence was brought to Bombay by the H. C. Sloop of war Coote, which anchored at Bombay on the 30th of April, that Sir Charles Napier was at Hydrabad in excellent health, regulating the administration. His Excellency is persuaded of the complete establishment of British authority in Scinde, but has not a sufficient force to garrison the towns. The Belochees from the mountains west of the Indus may be expected to come down and make another effort for the reconquest of the country; and against such a contingency it is necessary to provide. The search for prize articles still continued and was daily rewarded by new discoveries. In one fire place in the zenana, gold and coins to the value of three lakhs of Rupees had been discovered; one pair of ear-rings alone was valued at 3000 Rupees. Capt. Napier, the Governor's nephew, had come to Bombay on the Coote, and it was said would go to the Muhabuleshur Hills to prevail on Lady Napier not to proceed to Hydrabad, advice which, after the Cabul catastrophe, it would be unwise to disregard. One of the Ameers brought round is a very intelligent youth, Hossein Aly Khan. During his stay on board the vessel, he exhibited great intelligence and expressed a strong desire to travel, and to see Calcutta and London, and pay his respects to Queen Victoria.

— Yesterday evening's Calcutta Gazette announces the appointment of Mr. A. Turnbull and Mr. C. Beadon, as Under Secretaries to the Government of Bengal. It is not to be inferred however from this appointment, that they are to remain in the office till they are old enough in the service to succeed to the Secretaryship. It is said to be Lord Ellenborough's determination that after three or four years continuance in this post, they shall take their turn of duty in the Mofussil, where alone that local experience can be acquired which will completely fit a man for the office of Secretary.

— One of our North Western contemporaries states, that Lord Ellenborough has resolved that in future the Joint Magistrates shall reside at some place in the interior of the district and not at the station of the Magistrate; a measure worthy of much commendation. It is only by a judicious distribution of officers of secondary rank in the district, that abuses will be corrected and the administration purified.

— The Hurkaru states, that the Court of Directors have refused their sanction to the abolition of the Upper Orphan School. It must therefore, we suppose, be maintained upon its present most extravagant footing; extravagant, we mean when the expenditure is divided among the number of lads who receive education there.

FRIDAY, MAY 12.

— It is amusing to read the advertising columns of our Bombay contemporaries. The Calcutta Lottery has ceased to exist, and unless the Court of Directors should order it to be revived, we shall not be again visited with this moral plague. Yet the Bombay Courier has no less than three advertisements of Lotteries upon its Tickets, which occupy 3½ columns. Considering the large number of advertisements of the Lotteries which used to appear in the Journals at this Presidency, the support given to the suppresion of Lotteries by the Editors, is an instance of disinterestedness which should not pass without record.

— The Bombay papers of the 2d May supply some further particulars regarding Scinde. The Prize Agents continue their labours with great success. "The Zenanas have been most prolific, yielding bags of Rupees, gold and silver legged bedsteads, bars of gold, valuable armouries, gold saddles with silver stirrups, and bridles to match inlaid with pearls and precious stones."—The Military Commission which sat on the murderer of Capt. Ennis, has found him guilty and he was executed on a gibbet outside of Hydrabad on the morning of the 24th.—A great deficiency of carriage and especially of camels was beginning to be felt, as well as of fresh provisions, the Belochees having carried off their goats and cows; butter and even milk was become a luxury.

— The Delhi Gazette gives us letters from Khytul, now at our disposal, which state that Majors Lawrence and Mill with unremitting exertions had secured about 50,000 Rupees in horses, shawls, guns, &c. and about five lakhs of Rupees in cash. It also states, that if the light brigade consisting of Sissmore's troop, a squadron of dragoons, the 3d Irregular Cavalry, and the 26th Native Infantry had been pushed on by forced marches, more than fifty lakhs of Rupees might have been secured. That sum is now irrevocably lost, having passed in the first moments of confusion, into the hands of the people of the town and of the neighbouring districts.

— It has been pointed out to us that the assertion made in our paper of last week that "the Court of Requests had just ruled that its Attornies were entitled to a fee of 8 Rs. for every attendance," was incorrect. Fees to attornies are not sanctioned in the Court of Requests. It appears that Mr. R. F. Smith, a pleader in the Suburb Court, had engaged to do some work for one Mr. Habberley, for which he claimed the exhorbitant sum of 32 Rupees, which was cut down by the Court to 8 Rs.

SATURDAY, MAY 13.

— We are exceedingly happy to notice among the arrivals from sea yesterday that of the Julia, with the Bishop on board. That vessel had been overdue more than a fortnight, and apprehensions were entertained for her safety, which have now been happily dissipated. It appears that the protracted arrival of the vessel was owing to a visit paid by his Lordship to Goa, where he was received with the most cordial hospitality and bought golden opinions of the community by his great affability.

— A letter received by the Hurkaru from Loodiana, states that Mr. Clarke was about to proceed to Lahore with a couple of guns, an Infantry Regiment, and a Squadron of Horse, for the purpose of being present at Pertaub Singh's wedding.

— Intelligence from Bombay to the 3d arrived yesterday. The Head Quarters of the Queen's gallant 22d landed on the 2d. The Governor and Commander-in-Chief accompanied with a large concourse of European ladies and gentlemen as well as of natives, received them, with every mark of honour at the Apollo Pier. All the troops in the Garrison were drawn up in review order and saluted this distinguished corps. On the landing of the first division, a Royal Salute was fired.

— The Agra Ukhbar says, that it is reported and generally believed, that the Governor General contemplates a tour of some magnitude at the commencement of the cold season. He is to proceed first to Scinde, then to Bombay, thence to Madras, Calcutta, and back to Agra. Our contemporary says that some have surmized that the tour has been devised with a view to the restoration of the Somnath Gates; but he regards it as mere gossip; and well he might. His Lordship has had enough of the Gates; they will not stir an inch to the restored temple of Somnath.

MONDAY, MAY 15.

— The Englishman of this morning states, that Mr. Moore, the Deputy Post Master, has been appointed Post Master General;—another birth lost to the service, for it has always been filled by a Covenanted Servant. The Post Master Generalship, at the best of times, has been a post of little honour, as it has been usual to give it away to those of whom nothing could be made, to men who were reckoned among the Company's hard bargains. Latterly it has been turned into a kind of penal appointment, the Norfold Island of the Service. Every man who was in disgrace with the public Authorities, was put to preside over the Post Office, to keep him from starving. During all these choppings and changes, the department has been steadily advancing to its present high state of efficiency, through the unwearied labours of Mr. Moore; and it will be gratifying to find that the Deputy Governor has acknowledged his public services by bestowing on him this appropriate reward.

— The Englishman of this morning states, that the Lord Chancellor has finally decided that Mr. Mitford's bequest shall go, as he designed it, to the improvement of the city of Dacca. No ancient city in India stands more in need of the means of improvement than Dacca, which may be truly said like Venice to be 'dying daily.' The argument of Lord Lyndhurst, as quoted by our contemporary, is very remarkable. It was urged that the fund might be applied to the erection of a monument for the worshipping of idols; to which the Lord Chancellor replies, that it was directed to be applied to the benefit of the inhabitants; that such an application could not be for their benefit, and that it might be restrained by the Supreme Court.

— Some of our Madras contemporaries are grumbling because Dr. Lane, who has been appointed Private Secretary to the Governor, holds two Medical appointments already, being Surgeon to the Nabob's Durbar, and Superintendent of the Eye Infirmary. His Medical Offices give him 1400 Rs. a month; the Private Secretaryship 729, total 2129 Rupees; which is nearly 500 Rs. more than a Superintending Surgeon receives after some quarter of a century of medical toil and travel.

— The Delhi Gazette publishes a very melancholy account of the death of Mr. Reid, a young man of considerable talent and activity, to whose exertions Government owed the means of sending our their armies into Affghanistan. Through his various contracts he amassed in a short time a snug fortune of two or three lakhs of Rupees; but his attachment to the women of the country evidently proved his ruin.—He was found dead, and his property was claimed by an Affghan female who vowed that he had turned Mahomedan and had married her. The extract will tell the rest. How many of our countrymen with the finest prospects before them, have thus fallen victims to their own passions in the very prime of life!

— Eastman has been fully committed for the murder of Peterson. He is to be tried at the June Sessions of the Supreme Court.

TUESDAY, MAY 16.

— The supply of Ice in the Ice House has suddenly disappeared, and here we are in the middle of May positively without ice, and without hope of any for a whole month, possibly for two months. The fault lies with the American shippers who have sent out an inferior article. If this delinquency should be repeated, we shall begin to look to the eastern coast of China for the article. The last accounts from Hong Kong stated that it had been imported from Chusan in large quantities.

— The Hurkaru of this morning alludes to a report which has been some time in circulation, that the Governor General intended to issue some new and more stringent orders relative to the attendance of Civilians at their offices, who are to be cut by the hour for absence. We shall not comment on them till they are before the public. They will probably end in nothing. The hardworking Civilian will, as usual, work double tides, from conscientious motives or the impulse of nature, while the drones will still continue to go to Cutcherry at one, to decree and dismiss, and retire at four. We have much curiosity to see how our clever Governor General will contrive to prevent that neglect of official duties which every one knows to prevail in some four or five districts, and or how he will be able to discover that the Civilian has been out shooting when he reports himself employed in Miscellaneous duties.

— The Bombay Times received this morning states in its Commercial column that the Americans, who will this year have a crop of cotton sufficiently to clothe the whole world; and a few people more, intend to ship 100,000 bales to China, and thereby to spread dismay and possibly ruin among the cotton speculators of India. The Cotton, we are informed, is actually selling at New Orleans for less than the cost of freight to England.

— The Bombay Times of the 6th came in yesterday. It holds out a hope of receiving the April mail by the 12th of this month, in which case we may expect it here by Saturday next. In May, 1840, the Victoria Steamer brought the mails to Bombay on the 6th, but the Bombay Steamers have gradually fallen off in point of speed, and threaten to grow worse as they grow older.

— The Commander-in-Chief at Bombay has been under the necessity of severely reprimanding the Commanding Officer and the members of the successive Canteen Committees of H. M. 17th Regiment for their neglect of the financial economy of the corps. The Quarter Master Sasson's accounts exhibit a defalcation of not less than 47,000 Rupees. He seems to have carried on his systematic villany for a long period. The accounts appeared fair and square on paper, and were passed at once. No one ever took the pains to enquire whether the money given to the Quarter Master was ever paid by him to the various tradesmen in England or India to whom it was due. The consequence is, that they have been one and all defrauded, and the name of this gallant corps has been subject to the direst disgrace. All this has arisen from the blind confidence reposed in the honesty of the Quarter Master and from the absence of all wholesome mistrust. It is to be hoped that this reproof will serve as a warning to other Regiments, and put Commanding officers on their guard, many of the most valiant of whom are much better fitted to lead their corps into action, than to check the Quarter Master's accounts.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 17.

— The Star mentions with much satisfaction that the Governor General has been pleased to take special notice of the Zemindars and others who have of late years been public benefactors by the erection of hospices for travellers, the sinking of wells, or the planting of trees, and has caused them to be addressed separately in terms of commendation.

— The Star of this morning in a comment on the article which appeared yesterday in the Hurkaru, relative to the proposed rule for cutting the Civil Servants by the hour for absence, says, "We believe that the idlest of the Civil Servants are those at the Presidency, and there is this for their excuse that they are there." He might have said, and those who "toil terribly," to use a favourite expression of Sir Walter Raleigh, are also to be found there. The Star is hardly fair in this use of the superlative degree of comparison. We think we can match half a dozen of the gentlemen in the Mofussil, for the dolce far niente against any thing that the Metropolis can produce.

— The Madras papers state, that the Lady Sale had taken her passage with 150 Coolies, and the Kingston was about to do so, with 250 more, for the Mauritius. The Coolies, finding there was a demand for their labor have raised their prices; and it has been necessary to give them bounty money to the extent of 15 Rupees a head; they grumbled also that after having taken the bounty, they were not left at liberty to abscond. Latterly they have raised their demand to 20 Rupees. The last letters from the Mauritius represent them as being almost in a state of insurrection; and if all the accounts which are published be authentic, it would seem that the masters need as much protection from their fraud and violence, as they were supposed to do from the tyranny of the master.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

DWARKENATH TAGORE.

The meeting at Government House yesterday morning to witness the presentation of the gold medal to Dwarkanauth Tagore was a very large one. The following is the address made on the occasion by the Hon. Mr. Bird, and we cannot but cordially approve the excellent advice he gives the Native community, for the especial benefit of those gentlemen who have affected to consider themselves ill-used.

DWARKANAUTH TAGORE,

On your departure from England to return to your Native Country, the Hon'ble the Court of Directors of the East India Company requested your acceptance of a Gold Medal as a Testimonial of their esteem, and of, the approbation with which they regard the public benefits you have conferred on British India by the encouragement of Native Education, by the introduction of the arts and sciences, and by the generous support which you have given to the Charitable Institutions of Calcutta, whether established for the relief of the Native or of the British Community. The Court at the same time expressed their expectation that the whole course which you had pursued would have the effect of contributing to the accomplishment of the object which it had ever been their anxious desire to promote, namely, the identification of the feelings and interests of the Native and European population committed to their Government, and to the consolidation of the bonds which unite India with Great Britain.

That Medal has now been received, with directions to take an early opportunity of presenting you with the same, in the name and on the behalf of the Court, and it has appeared to us that we could not better carry their directions into effect than by presenting you with it in the presence of the Ladies and Gentlemen here assembled, who are the representatives of that European and Native population, the identification of whose feelings and interests is thus sought to be promoted.

But before I present to you this Testimonial, I wish to dwell for a few moments on the lesson to be learnt from it. It shews that there is every disposition in the highest quarters to reward merit in the Natives of India, and that there is nothing in an Indian Sun to prevent the growth of those qualifications, and the exercise of those virtues which lead to such rewards. But these distinctions are only obtainable after a long course of industry and perseverance. No one knows better than the distinguished individual now before me, how long he had to labour in obscurity and neglect. What prejudices he had to overcome, what difficulties to encounter before, he attained that high place in public opinion, which has brought him to the proud position in which he at present stands. Let me therefore exhort my Native friends who are looking for high situations to profit by his example, to display in the first instance the same zeal, ability, energy, and perseverance in the discharge of their public duties, to satisfy the public mind that they possess the same high qualifications as the testimonial is intended to recognise, and then they may rest assured that they will not fail in obtaining such advancement and such rewards as may be justly due to their merits and services.

(The Medal was then presented after which the President of the Council concluded in the following words:—)

Having now discharged the duty intrusted to me, there remains only to assure you of the satisfaction which it has afforded me, and that I join with the Honourable Court in the hope that your future career may be marked by happiness and prosperity. I hope also that you may long live to be an example to your fellow Countrymen, and that they, influenced by that example may more and more be convinced of what you have so frankly and honorably declared, namely, that the happiness of India is best secured by her connexion with great Britain, and that the Government under which you live has nothing more at heart than the improvement and welfare of the vast and populous empire which Providence has committed to its charge.

To the above address Dwarkanath replied as follows:—

HONOURABLE SIR,—If any circumstances could enhance the value of that flattering testimonial which you have conferred upon me in the name of the Honourable the Court of Directors, they are those in which I this day find myself.

It is most grateful to my feelings, Sir, to receive this gift at the hands of a distinguished servant of the East India Company, for whose public virtues and private excellencies, I, in common with all who know you, entertain the highest admiration.

It is gratifying, too, to have this honour bestowed in the place of my birth, and amongst so many of my fellow-citizens, and no less gratifying to receive it accompanied by the sentiments you have just expressed.

But I must be permitted to mention another circumstance which will I am confident give pleasure to all who hear me. During my visit to England, and while in the habit of daily intercourse with those who from their lofty stations control to so great a degree the destinies of this my native land, it was my privilege to listen to the most emphatic assurances of the heartfelt desire of her Majesty's Minister at the head of Indian affairs, and of the Court of Directors, to promote those measures which are most calculated to advance the intellectual, the moral, and the social welfare and happiness of Her Majesty's subjects, the natives of British India. If I had before reason to be thankful for the union that existed between India and Great Britain, I could not but feel my gratitude greatly increased, by such repeated evidence of a deep and growing anxiety to make that union subservient to the highest and best interests of my fellow countrymen. The proofs of the sincerity of these declarations, as well as of the earnest wish of the local government to carry out such noble intentions are every day furnished in the measures adopted for the improvement of the laws and institutions of this country, and their impartial and equitable administration of public affairs.

When apprized of the intention of the Honourable Court to bestow upon me the medal with which you have now invested me, I could not bring myself to believe that any thing in my conduct had rendered me pre-eminently worthy of such a distinction, and I was therefore led to regard the vote which had been passed, less as a compliment to myself, than as a pledge conveyed through me to the Natives of India, that their happiness and elevation are objects dear to their rulers, and that the humblest efforts to serve the country to which they belong, will neither pass unnoticed nor unrewarded.

Sir, having attempted to express my gratitude in a letter already in the hands of the Honourable Court, it is only necessary on this occasion to say that I shall with steadiness and renewed ardour pursue, with those around me, that course which has obtained for me so flattering a token of approbation; were any motive wanting to ensure my fidelity to the cause of my country, or my loyal attachment to the Government under which we live, this medal would supply it. While I live, it will constantly remind me of my duty, and when I die, I trust it will be to my posterity a stimulus to pursue the path which I have chosen, in the confident assurance that a life of devotion to useful purposes is the best way to secure the confidence of our fellow citizens, the good opinion of the Government and the favor of the Sovereign.

Suffer me, Sir, to offer my warmest thanks for the manner in which you have fulfilled the wishes of the Honourable Court, and to express my earnest hope, that prosperity and happiness may attend you, both in the administration of affairs of this important dependency, and in all the relations of domestic life.

In conclusion I beg you to convey to the Honourable Court an expression of my humble but lasting gratitude for the testimonial you have conferred upon me by their authority. Many of my countrymen may have higher claims, but no one amongst them could more highly appreciate the honor for which I now return my most heartfelt acknowledgments.

The incriptions on the Medal are, on the one side—

TO DWARKANAUTH TAGORE
FROM THE COURT OF DIRECTORS OF THE
EAST INDIA COMPANY,
1842.

And on the other,—

AS A TESTIMONIAL
OF THEIR ESTEEM

AND OF THE APPROBATION WITH WHICH THEY REGARD THE BENEFITS CONFERRED BY HIM UPON BRITISH INDIA.

Round this face of the Medal is inscribed—Hindu College, District Charitable Committee, Medical College, and Other Public Institutions, Calcutta.—Cal. Star, May 11.

THE FRIEND OF INDIA AND LORETTO HOUSE.

The Serampore Gazette, in one of those sly unobtrusive mischievous paragraphs, which it delights to insert whenever it can, unperceived, as it were, take a fling at Catholicity, informs its readers, in its issue of the eleventh Instant, on the authority of an anonymous Correspondent in the Englishman, who seems, say the Ana-baptist Editor, to be in the secret, that Protestant children do hazard their faith by being sent to Loretto House. And this notwithstanding, that the pious Editor understood, that the Catholic Priesthood asserted, that the subject of religion was not mooted at Loretto House, and that Protestant parents might send their children there with impunity. You that have tears at command, do shed a few to console a Champion of orthodoxy, a man of this world and the next, a printer, a preacher, a manufacturer on the cheapest terms of rags into beautiful glazed paper for Bibles, as well as into Cartridge paper for the special accommodation of the Affghans and Chinese. If you only knew, how copiously tears distilled from this child of affliction, when he first learned that the system of education at the Maruniere being condemned by the successor of St. Peter, excluded every Catholic, who valued his faith more than a mess of Pottage, from an Institution founded and endowed by a Catholic gentleman.—If you would only call to mind how this General Philanthropist wept, when the Catholic Paupers were cast off from relief by the liberal district Charitable Society, and when above all the very name of "Catholic bequest or Legacy" the name always before given to the Legacy for the poor, left by Mrs. English a Catholic Lady was expunged for ever, if you would only remember the generous, the liberal, the comprehensive sympathy of your Serampore Brother on all these trying occasions, you could not refuse him the tribute of a tear, now that he mourns over the ark of the Lord held captive by the Philistines of Loretto. But let the good man be consoled by the assurance, one that will fill his heart with an exuberance of joy, that in several instances, the Parents and Guardians of Protestant Children, when placing their proteges at Loretto House openly declared, that they had not the least objection, that their Wards should attend Catholic worship and instruction. In other instances, where the same permission was not given, we defy our contemporary to prove a single case, where either a command or a wish was intimated to a Protestant child, to induce that child to attend Catholic worship. No, the enlightened Directors of Loretto House are content, to let the amiable and edifying conduct and conversation of the Nuns make its due impression on the minds of the pupils there; they feel convinced that without the least violation of the religious liberty which is guaranteed to every Protestant child, the holy example, the endearing conduct of the Loretto ladies must teach their pupils to reverence a religion which cherishes the virtues they daily witness, and must banish forever from their minds, the low vulgar prejudices which happily for society are now taking shelter in such places as Serampore, the refuge of broken down Insolvents in property and reputation.—From a Correspondent of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

MR. MITFORD'S LEGACY.

A case was decided lately by the Lord Chancellor of some interest to Indian readers. Mr. Mitford, who had been long a Bengal civilian, left by his will the whole residue of his personal estate to the Governor of Bengal, to apply it to charitable, beneficial, and public works in Dacca, for the exclusive benefit of the native inhabitants, as they and the government might think most conducive to that end. The property being large, his relations disputed the validity of this bequest, and their counsel stoutly contended that it was void, in arguments which lasted many days. As might be expected, every imaginable objection that ingenuity could suggest was urged against the unfortunate gift; the statutes of mortmain, the uncertainty of the purpose, the impossibility of the Court of Chancery itself to look after the infant bequest, the doctrine of superstitious uses were all thundered against it, but in vain; the gift being held good by the Chancellor. Of none of these arguments, however, have we any thing to say, save one, that we shall notice for the deep interest with which it must be regarded by the present Governor General, at whom one would almost think, it had been specially pointed. It was strongly urged, that this bequest might be applied to idolatrous purposes, to the erection of a monument for the worshipping of idols, and other objectionable appropriations of the fund. Lord Lyndhurst's answer was striking, and deserves peculiarly the attention of his brother Baron and Minister: "The gift is for the benefit of the native inhabitants. This Court would not consider such an application of the funds as being for their benefit; nor would any other Court administered upon equitable principles consider that an application of the fund for the purpose of encouraging idolatry could be for their advantage. Therefore, the Supreme Court of Calcutta, exercising an equitable jurisdiction, would control, regulate, and restrain any such application. And as the Governor General is subject to that jurisdiction, except when acting entirely in his public capacity as Governor General in Council, he will, if he misapplies this fund, in the way suggested, be amenable to that Court." Upon this understanding the fund is to be paid over to the Governor General.—Englishman, May 15.

DEATH OF MR. REID.

"As it is possible you may get some incorrect reports of some late transactions here, I send a full account on which you may depend.

About three weeks since there died suddenly at Meerut, a Mr. Reid. The history of this man is singular and interesting. Of an enterprising and active mind he made himself highly useful to Government in the Commissariat Department, and realized honorably, in a short space of time, a large fortune by the Commission on grain, &c. purchased for the use of the army in Affghanistan. The laurels on the brows of Lord Keane and Sir R. Sale were mainly won for them by Mr. Reid, whose individual skill procured supplies when all other agents failed. It is said he died worth three lakhs of Rupees and his age did not exceed 32. On his return from Kurnaul, at the beginning of April, where he had successfully proved his claim for a sum of 18,000 Rs. from Government, he was suddenly taken ill and died. No medical assistance was applied for, and an inquest was held on the body. At the inquest the members were not aware that any large sum of money was possessed by the deceased. An European pensioner present seemed to account quite satisfactorily for every thing, and he was buried in the church yard. A few days after, on the investigation of the effect by the Judge, a claim was set up by an Affghan woman, who had lived with him, for the property for herself and female infant, on the ground that he was a Mussulman and had been married to her in the Mahomedan fashion, a Serjeant swore that in laying out the body, he observed that Mr Reid had been circumcised. The Judge appears to have adjudged the property to the woman and her child in consequence. Various reports were soon spread that large bribes had been offered, and that Mr. Reid was not a Mussulman as had been represented. At length the Chaplain determined to investigate the case. If the Judge were right in considering the man a Mussulman, it was clear a gross fraud had been practised by his friends in bringing him for Christian burial, and the church yard was no proper resting place for his bones. On the other hand, if he had not been circumcised and had not apostatized, those who proved him to the Judge's satisfaction, a Mussulman, must have been guilty of knavery, and not much wonder, seeing three lakhs of rupees hung on the decision, one lakh would purchase witnesses for anything. With the sanction of the authorities of the station the body was exhumed on Friday the 28th (April) at gun-fire; two medical officers were present, and as far as we have as yet learned, the decided opinion is, that there is not the slightest reason to believe that Mr. Reid had ever submitted to circumcision, and the report of his having apostatized to the Mussulman faith is a slander. Several officers who knew the deceased in Affghanistan, and had heard of his liaisons with Affghan and Kashmerian women, never heard a rumour of his having obtained possession of them by becoming a Mussulman. The party in the interest of the Affghan woman who calls herself his wife, were in dismay when they heard the resolution of the Chaplain to have the case duly investigated. As a public servant of Government, Mr. Reid was highly esteemed; he accompanied Sir Robert Sale from Cabul to Jellalabad, and formed part of the Illustrious Garrison."*—Delhi Gazette.

SIR ROBERT GRANT.

Sir Robert Grant was endowed by Providence with an extraordinary combination of natural talents; he possessed a masculine understanding, an acute discernment of character, the soundest judgment, a warm heart, and a fervid and commanding eloquence—all elevated and sanctified, as he entered into life, by the highest Christian principles.

He received in early youth an education of the most finished kind at one of our English Universities, Cambridge, and where he, together with his elder brother carried off the highest University honors* with the applause of all his contemporaries.

He came out to India at a mature period of life, after having been trained and schooled as it were for his honourable office during the long period of forty years under his admirable Father, whom he aided in many of the great questions relating to the East, taking a part in the discussions in the Court of Proprietors, and publishing two considerable volumes in 1813 on subjects connected with the renewal of the Charter, which testified his powers of mind, his elegance and force of composition, and the vast fund of information on which he could draw even at that period.

He had the further advantage of coming out to India an accomplished Statesman, having been for many years a distinguished Member of the Commons House of Parliament, and standing side by side with his honoured Father and Brother on various great occasions. He knew every thing that India needed. He was Chairman of one of the Committees appointed to report to the House preparatory to the Charter Act of 1833. He had thus been accustomed to take a Statesman-like view of all questions affecting her national happiness.

When he arrived in this country in 1835 or rather returned to it—(for he had gone home for education at the age of nine) he felt a kind of hereditary attachment to the people he was about to govern—the interval of 47 years had been in fact spent in preparation—all his sympathies and associations of thought had been directed by his venerated Father to the love of India. He needed not, therefore, as most other Governors, to learn slowly his line of duties; he brought out all that knowledge with him, and used it at once to the highest purposes. Not that he presumed on that speculative and home knowledge, or neglected the further sources of information on the spot which could alone render it wise and practicable. On the contrary, a more modest, unassuming, kind hearted Ruler never sat on the seat of authority; one who sought with more eagerness for information from every quarter, and who treated all around him with the deference which is due from a Governor to persons of consideration around him. No one was ever more free from conceit, rashness, self-will, pertness, or a desire to act independently of those who were appointed to aid him.

But he knew India, and threw himself body and soul into its interests; India was his passion; all the stores of information and all the wisdom acquired by experience under such a Father were poured out for the benefit of the people entrusted to his care. The time of his Government is not so much to be reckoned by the few months which Providence allotted him, as by the multiplied designs and measures which filled that narrow space, for he crowded and jammed, as it were, a whole life into the three years of his Government.

At the period of his arrival in Bombay he had, like other Governors, some peculiar advantages and some disadvantages.

The grand advantage was the peace which prevailed in India. There were no wars, no insurrections, no marching of the troops, no exhaustion of the time and spirits and strength of public men in immediate and arduous and unlooked for emergencies. He had all the leisure for internal improvements, and all the command of the leisure of the Military and Civil Services, with some of that comparative affluence also of the Treasury, which peace allows, and which war, in addition to all its other miseries, breaks up. This was an immeasurable blessing. War stops every thing, except what is subservient to its own necessary but ghastly progress.

He had also the advantage of the experience, talents and excellent judgment of his friend, the Honorable Mr. Farish, a Member of his Council and his successor, on his sudden and premature demise, by whom all his designs were most ably and cordially seconded.

It was a disadvantage to him on the other hand, to be the first Governor of Bombay, after the New Charter of 1833, and to have to accustom himself and those around him, to increased restrictions which were then imposed, in the first roughness, so to speak, of their working.

* It may be remembered that a servant of Mr. Reid first brought the intelligence of the murder of the Envoy from Cabul to Jellalabad.—E. D. G.

* The two Brothers, were Third and Fourth Wranglers and First and Second Medallists.

Nor could it fail to be a disadvantage also, that he had been so mixed up all his life with Indian authorities and Indian questions at home, that it was impossible but that some effects of prejudice and party spirit should pursue him to India. He knew too much.

Possibly some of his best schemes and projects for the highest benefit of Hindoostan may have failed to carry the Honorable Court with them from this cause.

On one occasion I understand he burst into an agony of tears at the arrival of a dispatch which violated, as he thought, the faith to which his Government was pledged; and for the moment determined to throw up his post in despair.

Still amidst all encouragements and discouragements he discharged his main duties with unusual vigour and success.

He seized with a statesman's eye the real matters of primary importance. He had the highest conception of the capabilities of this magnificent appendage of the British Crown.

He considered its vast resources to have been scarcely opened; and he was full of zeal to raise its position amongst the nations of the world. To this end he fixed his aim on some of the main springs of national greatness—the excitement of a spirit of enterprise in commercial pursuits—the improvement and discovery of agricultural staple productions—the facilities of external and internal communication—and the progress of national Education including Medicine, and a preparation for estimating the evidences and excellency of Christianity.

To promote a spirit of Commercial Enterprize, he formed a Chamber of Commerce in 1836, the year after his arrival; he hastened to remove imposts which were proved to him to be vexatious, he revised and lightened the pressure of various taxes, and he modified and re-arranged some of the rents of the Deccan which he found to be unequally imposed.

To improve and call into existence those agricultural productions which are the true riches of a country and tend most directly to encourage and reward a spirit of industry and good order in the native population—he laboured to introduce and cherish the cultivation of Cotton, Sugar, Silk, Indigo, and actually projected a scheme of the brightest promise and with the wisest provisions, connected with these and similar objects.

Together with this, he gave his best attention to the facilitating communication with England and internally. He was the ardent friend of Steam, and promoted the construction of roads, tanks, drains, sea-walls, bridges, &c. to improve the internal communication, without which Commerce and Agricultural productions would, he knew, be attempted to little effect.

Once more, education with a bearing on the only true religion, Christianity, occupied his care from the first moment of his landing. His ardent desire was to raise the prostrate nations of India to the knowledge, the skill in medicine and the arts, the internal jurisprudence, the habits and comforts of domestic life, and the tone of civilization which prevailed in the more favoured nations of Europe. He longed to communicate to India all the blessings, intellectual, social, and religious, flowing from the beneficent revelation of Divine Mercy in the Gospel.

The diffusion of the Evidences and Claims of that Gospel he considered the ultimate scope of education. He attached a transcendent importance to Christianity as the most stupendous benefit ever vouchsafed by Almighty God to a lost world, and the Evidences of which needed only to be candidly weighed to gain universal acquiescence. He fully believed that the propagation of the Gospel in every safe and discreet method was the design of Providence in entrusting India almost by miracle to the sceptre of the greatest, the freest, the most powerful, and most enlightened of the Western nations. To deprive a hundred and fifty millions of people of the means of knowing the grand bequest designed for them by the Father of the Universe, by barring out the access to its documents, its history, its truth, its character, he accounted a cowardice and a crime of no common atrocity.

I remember he said to me in 1835 (when I spent more than a fortnight on my visitation under his roof) that no one could divine what would be the state of the country fifty years from that time; that we were educating India for Empire, as, said he, I told a Director twenty years since; and that we seemed drawn on by a train of events, without the intention, and contrary to the intention of the British Government, and the highest Indian Authorities both at home and in this country, to wider and wider dominions, that we might be the instruments in the hand of Providence of illuminating the Eastern world.

At the same time, Sir Robert was most wise and cautious in his particular measures; and he once expressed to me a strong objection to the teaching of our Holy Religion by means of Heathen Masters, who by their ignorance, their deceit and their hatred to Christianity would be sure to connect the most false notions of it in the mind of the young Heathens and Mussulmans.

The foundation of the personal excellencies of our lamented Friend's character, by which all these measures were planned and carried out, was sterling conscientiousness and integrity, sustained by religious principle. If ever there was a downright honorable, honest, upright person, it was Sir Robert Grant—This gave purity and elevation to all his public conduct. There was a devotion to India and unconcern for his own immediate interests, an independence as to secondary pursuits, a contempt and abhorrence of jobs or what seemed like jobs, whether little or great, an anxiety to discover and bring to light modest merit, a determination to examine every case even in its minutest ramifications; in a word, that conspicuous integrity and straightforwardness which constitute the primary excellencies of a public person, and which when joined to talent and experience like those of my late friend, go to form the great Governor.

And such he would have been in a far higher degree than he was, if he had nor attempted too much—Here he failed from mere nobleness of heart. He did not sufficiently employ the eyes and hands of others—no human strength could suffice for carrying on a great Government in such a climate as India, for any length of time, on the plan which he proposed to himself.

It was not that he was not diligent—he was incessant in his application; when I lived under his roof, he would not spare the time even to breakfast with his family. It was not that he did not exercise an independent judgment—for he formed his own unbiassed opinion after he had weighed those of others—It was not that he did not decide on undertaking improvements—for he seized with a statesman's eye, as I have mentioned, all such proposals. Nor was it that he wanted boldness; for he acted on his own responsibility to the utmost verge of what he judged right. But he carried his conscientiousness and acuteness in discerning opposing reasons to an extent which was in fact impracticable, and which ultimately lessened the amount of the good he actually effected. He delayed cases too much in order to make time to weigh every possible circumstance that could sway his judgment, and to discover the means of least hurting the feelings of those whose requests he was compelled to decline. He read and re-read every thing for himself. He wrote too frequently his own letters, and dispatches, and minutes. He did not do common things in a common way. He had no idea of reserving the full exertion of his powers, for occasions worthy of them. Every thing was to be of the very best, and thus he sunk in the prime of his usefulness, surrounded with the love and confidence which his eminent qualities generated, but lost prematurely to his country and to India by overworking both mind and body. But after all, what a splendid eulogium is it on a public person, that his only faults lay on the side of a scrupulousness of doing wrong, and a study of performing every thing in the best possible manner.

Of his most exemplary private character and his religious views and feelings I need not speak. He was a Christian Governor. He understood and honoured the religion he professed. He knew what was meant by a heartfelt and vital Christianity in contradistinction from one of form and profession. His piety rested on true repentance for sin, faith in the atoning sacrifice of Christ, the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit, love to God and man, the study of the Holy Scriptures, habits of prayer and attendance on all the appointed means of grace, every good word and work.

The love which he thus felt for Christianity he testified by the observance of family devotions, by his presence twice on the Lord's Day at Church, by his lively interest in Christian Missions, (on one occasion he invited all the Missionaries of the different Societies to meet me at his table when I was residing with him in 1835)—and his anxiety that the Ministers and Members of our Holy Religion should set a conspicuous example in the sight of the Heathen.

Never shall I forget in this view the affectionate and respectful, but faithful, advice he gave me concerning my Sermons and proceedings at Bombay—pointing out their defects and counselling me how best to remove them. The last Sunday of my Visitation he sent me a note to meet him in the garden soon after Service, and then besought me to be bold and decisive in my concluding discourse of that morning.

This was in the true spirit of Christian friendship and endeared him to my inmost soul. Indeed, sincere piety was the spring of these and all other his virtues as a husband, a father, a friend, and the Head of a Government. It was, also, the source of his watchfulness over himself, his courtesy to others, the purity and instructiveness of his conversation, and the dignity, kindliness and magnanimity of his whole character.

Accordingly when death suddenly threatened him in the midst of his usefulness (he had only been three years and four months in India—and I remember now with a melancholy pleasure how fondly he talked of coming round to see me at Calcutta, with Lord Glenelg whom he meant to invite to accompany him, when his five years were up and he was ready to return home) as death approached, I say, and broke up all his designs and projects, at a moment when his family and himself least expected it, he yet knew where to turn for hope. His prayers for mercy were most humble and sincere; his examination of his own heart penetrating; the prostration of his soul before God under a sense of unworthiness unreserved; his renunciation of his own righteousness before the bar of God and his humble reliance on the alone merits of his Saviour most entire; whilst his love to hear the Holy Scriptures read to him, so long as reason remained, proved to his broken hearted sorrowing Lady and to all around him whence he drew his consolation in the last struggle.

The burst of grief throughout this Presidency, and indeed the whole of Hindostan at the tidings of his death is such as was perhaps scarcely ever equalled. Few, very few Governors have fallen in India itself; and the purity of his administration, the splendor of his talents, the vast amount of good he had achieved, the excellency of his private character, the sincerity and dignity of his piety, the very overstrained efforts under which he sank, broke upon every mind. And seldom, as I understand, has a public Meeting after the death of a distinguished person been attended with so crowded and mournful and laudatory in any part of India, as that which was assembled in the Town Hall at Bombay where the Resolutions were passed on which you are now acting for taking measures for honoring his memory. The enumerations of the various services he had rendered and the plans he had designed for the benefit of the Natives, indeed, appears to me, on re-perusal, more like the description of a romance than the details of matters of actual occurrence.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Within these few days a very idle question has been brought on the tapis—and as the contest about it is becoming as warm as that with the Beloochees, you will kindly excuse my giving you the trouble to make peace between the parties, although my fears are, the Moonsiff being quite indignant, that any thing short of a Circular cannot effect the reconciliation. A Moonsiff and the Judge to whom he is subordinate are quarrelling about the use of the word Saheb after the name of the former in the heading of his proceedings thus:—ba ijlas Mr. ——— Moonsiff Saheb. No doubt litigations on such a subject betrays shallow mindedness in both parties; but as it is contested and angrily too, would you kindly give your opinion. The Moonsiff has based his claim to the use of the word Saheb, because all who are clad in an English dress—profess the Christian religion—or rather in his own words is a feringee, are called by the Natives Saheb whether, he be noble or plebeian. The Judge disputes the point and questions the propriety of the Moonsiff using it, saying it is applicable only to the covenanted branch of the service and this branch alone is to be distinguished by the word Saheb. It is presumed therefore because a Moonsiff is a man of colour he is not a Saheb, or because he is not on terms of familiarity with the Judge, he is not a Saheb. But what does this word Saheb mean? And how came it into use? Have we any Regulation, Circular or Constructions for the use of it, or is it applied by prescriptive usage originating with the Natives themselves? Shakespeare and Thompson define it in their Lexicons, "A Lord, Master, Companion," and to the point, "in composition, possessor possessed of, endoweth with—for instance Sahibi ikhtear—possessor of power, Sahibi jumal, beautiful." Now from this it is very clear that both the Judge and his Moonsiff may use the term Saheb after their names and before the designation of their offices with the greatest of precision, Saheb Judge—holder of the office of Judge. Saheb Moonsiff holder of the situation of Moonsiff. In fact when we reflect for one moment that the colloquial assigns the term to an European waiting servant, it appears to me, after all, the subject debated will end in results which cannot add to the dignity of either of the contending parties.

But while on this subject, permit me to enquire whether the form of address circulated by Government for the Uncovenanted Service, is to be used when the Covenanted functionary is addressing the Uncovenanted branch of the service, or is it to be used also by one uncovenanted servant to another in the Uncovenanted service?

Yours truly.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—In the last Number of the Friend of India, in the Weekly Epitome, you noticed my communication in the Englishman regarding the Loretto House. The interpretation you put on the word 'hazard' is far from what I intended it to convey. If I mistake not, I learnt from the pages of your paper the very affectionate answer the Reverend Bishop made to the petition signed by a very numerous body of Protestants about the establishment of a school on the principle as the Nunnery. In that answer I believe the worthy prelate said, that children are very partial to imitation; and from their infancy being brought up in an institution where papal ceremonies are performed with all the solemnity possible, there is a likelihood of their following it. You will admit that there is a hazard in that. With regard to any interference in their religion, about which you insinuate, I beg most honorably to exonerate the Sisterhood from any such blame.

The only thing I regret for Protestants in that Institution is the absence of any instruction whatsoever in their religion; it is as Dr. Duff has emphatically expressed it, "an Education without a religion."

The few private schools which exist only admit a limited number of pupils and our official duties so engross our time and attention, that the Education of our children if left to us, must be entirely neglected.

We want a public school where the rudiments of a good education will be given, and I would recommend a missionary and his wife to establish one in a central situation, and if they do not receive enough of encouragement, you will then have reason to censure the Protestant.

One word more and I will be done. Would it not be more consonant with common sense if Missionaries evinced a more sedulous care for their own flock than for heathens? It would be much the better if they were to "look to home" first; and then the work among pagans would be laudable: to attend to the latter at the expence of the former is indeed very ridiculous.

I am, &c.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

Spread of Puseyism.—When we noticed, some months since, the conversion to Roman Catholicism of a youth in Shrewsbury School, the Head Master, Dr. Kennedy, somewhat vehemently defended himself, and the other masters, from the charge of Tractarianism. We now find that Mr. Newman's paper boasts, that "the Masters of Westminster, Harrow, Eton, and Shrewsbury, are in the right way;" i. e. in Mr. Newman's way.—Oxford Chronicle.

The Bishopric of Jerusalem at a Stand.—On the 14th ult., Izzet, Pasha of Jerusalem, forwarded a message by one of his Effendis to M. Nicolayson, the Chaplain of Bishop Alexander, enjoining him, as he had no authority for building a Protestant Church at Jerusalem, to cause the works to be suspended. M. Nicolayson having vainly remonstrated with the Pasha, it was resolved that the Bishop should repair to Beyrout, to take the advice of the British and Prussian Consuls-General; and his Lordship accordingly started from Jerusalem on the 20th for Jaffa, where he embarked for Beyrout. On the 23d, he reached this last city, and laid the case before those two functionaries, who thought proper to refer it to their respective Ambassadors at Constantinople. Assad Pasha, to whom they applied in the mean time for an explanation of the motives of this prohibition, pleaded total ignorance of the affair.

"The intrigues of the Greeks and Latins at Jerusalem," observes the Correspondent of the Chronicle at Constantinople, "have, at length, produced the results long since foretold in the Chronicle. The Protestant church, the walls of which were rapidly progressing, but for the building of which no permission has ever been obtained from the Porte, has been forbidden to advance. Remonstrances, so it is affirmed, have been made by the Bishop to the British Ambassador, and his Excellency will, doubtless, have given the subject all due consideration. But he is aware that the question was sifted and debated by Lord Ponsonby, with all the zeal and anxiety that the case merited; but, in this instance, his Lordship's arguments and personal influence failed to make any impression upon the Porte. The Oolemahs entrenched themselves behind the law; and, as there was no point in our conventions by which these laws could be triumphantly combated, the subject was reluctantly abandoned to the force of events It is probable that Sir Stratford Canning, having this example before him, and not having the personal influence of his predecessor, will be less likely to attempt to obtain by reasoning what Lord Ponsonby could not secure as a concession. The conduct of the Ottoman Government is here again most unwise. It is enough, that its political acts should produce enmities; but it is most impolitic to excite religious antipathies; and if the impediments to the building of the Protestant Church be persisted in, it is evident that it will excite a general feeling of hostility throughout England and Protestant Germany. Besides, this proceeding is most impolitic in another sense. Asia, as well as European Turkey, is overrun with political propagandists of the Church of Rome Their object is to gain proselytes, for the sole purpose of sowing dissensions and establishing a subversive power against the dominant race. This is the case in Syria, in the districts of Mossoul and Diarbekir, and in various parts of Roumelia. By attempting to crush the establishment of a Protestant Church, the Porte deprives itself of a counteracting medium, and thence of a safeguard. But the fault does not rest so much with the Porte as with the agents and clergy of the Latin and Greek churches, whose jealousies have not lain dormant, as generally supposed."

Between Greek and Latin, there is not a pin to choose, and we care not which triumphs, if either must: only the Greeks, or those who, being Anglicans, fight under the Greek banner, will well have deserved their defeat, if they suffer one, for violating the principle of Establishments under the name of an Establishment,—for attempting to "cast out devils by Beelzebub, the prince of devils." The Latins went out as Missionaries, on a level with the Voluntary Missionaries of various Protestant bodies, and of them, even the Sublime Porte cannot and does not complain; but our Government, in sending out a Bishop in a Queen's ship, and identifying him with itself by means of other privileges and distinctions, has obviously committed a grievous trespass upon the territory of a foreign power, which that power has a right to resist; especially as, in doing so, it is but doing what the English Government itself would do, if the Ottoman Court were to send out a grand mufti to England, with orders to build a mosque on the most eligible site in London. The Chronicle's Correspondent is quite mistaken in supposing that the spirited conduct of the Pasha of Jerusalem will excite a general feeling of hostility throughout England and Protestant Germany. Protestant Germany will secretly exult at the frustration of his Prussian Majesty's overweening zeal; and England, her clergy only excepted, will care nothing at all about it.—Pat.

Presents of Books to the Different Police Stations.—The formation of proper libraries at the different Metropolitan police stations was publicly suggested some time since, and the London City Mission, promptly acting upon the suggestion, have just presented, we are informed, about 50 volumes to each police station, for the use of the men attached to it. The works consist of the Scriptures, and sermons and other religious books. They can be either read at the station-houses, or taken home by the constables under certain restrictions.—Ibid.

Lady Rachel Russell, in her Letters, mentions that Dr. Beveridge objected to read a brief in Canterbury cathedral for the benefit of the distressed Protestant refugees, because it was contrary to the rubrics. "Doctor, Doctor," replied Archbishop Tillotson, "charity is above rubrics." The good Archbishop alluded probably to the text, "Have ye never read what David did when he was a hungred?"—Record.

Appointment of Dr. Vaughan as President of the Lancashire Independent College.—We have the pleasure of announcing, that the Rev. Dr. Vaughan has signified his acceptance of the post of President and Professor of Theology in the new Lancashire Independent College, to which with just discrimination, he has been unanimously invited by the Committee of that Institution. It may be supposed, that his resignation of his pastoral charge cannot have been received without great reluctance and regret by the Church at Kensington; but, how painful soever it may be to lose the ministerial services of such a man, we cannot doubt that, on cool reflection, they will be satisfied that, in taking the course on which he has resolved, their learned Pastor is pursuing the path which Divine Providence has manifestly opened before him, and that it would be taking a narrow, not to say a selfish, view of the interests of the Church of Christ, to wish to detain him from a sphere of labour so important and so well suited to his talents and acquirements. It will be comparatively easy to find a successor to Dr. Vaughan, at Kensington, who shall be as well, and perhaps in some respects even better, qualified for the duties of the pastoral office; but it is not so easy to find men duly qualified for situations like that which he is about to occupy. This, indeed, is an appointment on which we may congratulate all parties. We congratulate the Doctor himself on his having been divinely guided, as we believe, to the formation of an engagement in which, while it is congenial to his tastes and pursuits, he will have opportunities of rendering greater services to his own denomination, and to the cause of truth, than, with all his ability as an author and a minister, he possibly could in any narrower or less scholastic sphere. We congratulate his whole Denomination, including, as we are sure we may, his late flock, on the great advantage to its interests, which must accrue from so ripe a scholar and so well-disciplined a mind being placed at the head of the last, but by no means the least, of its Theological Institutions. And, finally, we congratulate the town of Manchester itself on the accession to its learned circles of the acute, philosophical, and liberal Author of "The Age of Great Cities."—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Puseyite Politics.—A London weekly paper has recently been purchased by one of the most extravagant of Mr. Newman's clerical followers, the sixth number of which has appeared. The Newman paper contains an article which argues, that the Prayer Book, as it now stands, is not binding upon the Church! Why? Because some portions of it have not received the consent of conscriptions! As an example, it is said, "all about King William III. is interpolated;" and this great prince is compared to "Judas Iscariot." Not quite so fast, Mr. Newman, if you please. The people will not have the Prayer Book altered to favour "Popery and arbitrary government," and insult the Queen by denying her title to the throne.—Pat.

The Duke of Wellington and the Tractarians.—The following is from a weekly paper which draws its inspiration direct from Littlemore:—"Our readers will learn with surprise that the University of Oxford has contented itself with sending a single petition against the union of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor; and still more, that the Upper House of Parliament is the one that has not been addressed! It appears that the Board of Heads of Houses, with whom rests the initiative in regard to all measures to be submitted to Convocation, having received an intimation from his Grace the Duke of Wellington, the Chancellor of the University, that he does not approve of opposition to the recommendation of the ecclesiastical commission, have entered into a kind of compromise only to petition the Commons in this matter. One conclusion is forced upon us by this occurrence, that the University will do well on another occasion to select a Chancellor who does not occupy a high place in the political world; such a connexion presents temptations on both sides. Meanwhile, let the clergy in their respective neighbourhoods redouble their exertions; it cannot be but that Sir R. Peel will yield to the voice of the Church, if it is shown to be unanimous."—Ibid.

Strange Generosity.—There is now to be seen at the shop of Mr. Rait, goldsmith, Buchanan-street, Glasgow, a beautiful and richly chased tea and coffee service of plate, together with a magnificent silver candelabrum, presented with equal generosity and delicacy of feeling to Mr. Alison, sheriff of the county, by an unknown individual in one of the commercial cities of England. The following inscription is engraven on the tribute:—"To Archibald Alison, Esq., Author of the History of Europe during the French Revolution. In testimony of the sense entertained of the benefits he has conferred upon his country. From an Unknown Donor."—Ibid.

Rumoured Judicial Changes.—The retirement of Lords Lyndhurst and Abinger, is again the subject of various rumours. Among the Bar, it is said, that, as soon as Mr. T. Duncombe's motion has been disposed of, the Chief Baron will resign, it being manifest that he is no great favourite with the profession, and equally manifest from his being often surprised by sleep in the middle of a trial, that he is physically incapable of the efficient discharge of judicial duties. The learned Lord will, it is expected, be succeeded by Sir F. Pollock: in which case Sir W. Follett will become Attorney-General, and Mr. Thesiger, Solicitor-General. There is less certainty about the retirement of the Lord Chancellor and the changes which will ensue upon that event. On one side, it is stated, that, when the Great Seal is resigned by Lord Lyndhurst, it will be given to Sir W. Follett; an arrangement which has, indeed, been deemed inevitable. But, on the other side, it is said, that Mr Pemberton is to be the new Chancellor. This report appears to originate with the Exeter Times, where the probabilities of the case are not unlikely to be correctly estimated. But it may possibly be a mere guess, founded upon the steps about to be taken for procuring a seat in Parliament for the Attorney-General for Ireland, who, it seems, can find no asylum in his own country. The rumour is, that Miss Lawrence's pocket borough is to become a refuge for the destitute on this as on many a former occasion; but, whether by the retirement of Sir G. Cockburn, who, though convalescent, will not for a long time be fit for public duties, or by that of Mr. Pemberton, preparatory to his elevation to the Chancellorship, remains uncertain. Of course, there can be no competition with Sir W. Follett in point of political claims; but, in the first place, Sir Robert Peel cannot well spare so able a Lieutenant in the Lower House; and, in the second, if special qualifications are to be considered in the appointment of Lord Lyndhurst's successor, as seems to be the inclination of all parties both in and out of the profession, why, then, the personal claims of the Conservative pet must give way to the undoubted superiority of the learned Member for Ripon, as an accomplished equity lawyer.—Pat.

THE HISTORY OF THE MYSTERY.—In the event of Lord Abinger's retirement from the Bench, which is daily expected, it is supposed that Lord Brougham will renew his application to Lord Lyndhurst for the vacant Chiefship—of course, on the score of saving the country the salary.—Leeds Mercury.

THE WILBERFORCES.—We hear that the living of East Farleigh, in the gift of the Lord Chancellor, is presented, or is about to be presented, to the Rev. Henry Wilberforce, curate of Walmer. This living was given about ten years since, by Lord Brougham, to the Rev. Robert Wilberforce, out of regard to his father. It was exchanged with the Rev. Charles Lutwidge, about three years since, for the living of Burton Agnes, in Yorkshire, which Mr. Robert Wilberforce now holds. Mr. Lutwidge has recently died at Hastings, and now Farleigh is again given to a Wilberforce, the youngest of all the brothers. It is, we believe, of the value of above 900*l.* per annum.—Ibid.

REFUSAL OF FUNERAL RITES TO PAGANINI.—The celebrated Paganini has not yet been laid in consecrated ground, in consequence of the opposition of the Bishop of Nice. This prelate refuses the last prayers of the church to the celebrated violinist, and the inhabitants of Nice, proud of their talented townsman, have brought the affair before the Court of Rome. 500,000 francs are devoted to the expenses of this appeal. Meanwhile a house has been given up to the remains of Paganini, which repose on a state bed. The body has been embalmed, so as to be in a state to await the issue of the appeal.—Pat.

ANALYSIS OF THE FOURTH REPORT OF THE REGISTRAR-GENERAL.—The Fourth Annual Report of the Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in England, has just been laid before Parliament; and its contents will supply the best answer to the flippant and ignorant remarks which are still occasionally heard from interested parties in depreciation of the importance of the new system of Civil Registration. The medical Statistics comprised in this Report are invaluable, as throwing much light upon the Causes of Death, the State of Public Health, the Rate of Mortality, and the laws which regulate the increase of the Population. The incidental information furnished with respect to the condition of the lower classes, is also of great importance. We shall lay before our readers a few of the facts which have been brought to light by means of a careful and laborious collation of the Registrar's returns.

First, with regard to Marriages. It appears that, during the last year, there have been fewer marriages than in 1839-1840 by nearly 2,000; that is, relatively to the female population, the proportion has been nearly 3 per cent. less than in the preceding year. This decrease is observable in all the divisions of the Kingdom except the South-eastern counties, but chiefly in Yorkshire and the North-western division, particularly as compared with 1838-9. In that year, in Lancashire and Cheshire, 1,737 women were married out of 100,000; in the last year, only 1,663 out of the same population. The proportion of females married appears to be highest in the Metropolis; but this arises in part from the influx of persons from the country. The proportion is considerably higher in the Northern, than in the Southern Counties; but that of Early Marriages,—that is the proportion of persons married under 21 years of age,—is greater in the agricultural counties of Bedford, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Essex, Northampton, and Hertford, than in any other part of the kingdom; it is, however, the lowest in Devonshire and Shropshire, and in the Metropolitan district. In Bedfordshire, 25 in 100 women marry under age; in Devonshire, Shropshire, and Hereford, only 9 in 100.

Further, the Marriage Registers have afforded a test of the State of Education, so far as regards writing. From the average of three years it appears, that 33 men in 100, and 49 women in 100, signed with marks; "it is therefore probable that only 67 men and 51 women in 100 can write their own names." There is a slight increase in the total number of men who wrote their names. But the proportion varies remarkably in different divisions. "The differences of intellect, habits, and occupations," it is observed, "can scarcely account for the remarkable fact, that 84 in 100 men can write in Cumberland, 81 in the East Riding of York, and only 54 in 100 in Cambridgeshire, and 43 in 100 in Bedfordshire." According to this test, the state of Education appears to be lowest or most inadequate, in the following counties:—

| | Proportion per cent. who signed with marks. Males. | Females. |
|---|---|---|
| Bedfordshire | 58 | 62 |
| Monmouthshire | 52 | 64 |
| Herts | 51 | 56 |
| Essex | 47 | 54 |
| Suffolk | 47 | 52 |
| Cambridgeshire | 46 | 56 |
| Huntingdonshire | 46 | 47 |
| Worcestershire | 46 | 60 |
| Norfolk | 44 | 50 |
| Wilts | 44 | 54 |
| Stafford | 44 | 60 |

In the Metropolitan districts, the mean proportion is 32 males, 31 to 35 females. In Cumberland, 16 males, 36 females.

Of 122,482 Marriages in England, in the year ending, June 30, 1841, 8,034 were celebrated "not according to the rites of the Established Church," being not quite 1 in 14; of which 5,816 were in registered places of worship, 2,036 in Superintendent-registrars'-offices, 66 between Quakers, and 116 between Jews. The total number of buildings registered in England for the solemnization of marriage, now amounts to 1,730; in Wales, 192; total, 1,922; namely:—

|---|---|
| Presbyterian | 178 |
| Independent | 793 |
| Baptist | 461 |
| Methodist (Armenian) | 135 |
| Calvinistic Methodists | 42 |
| Roman Catholic | 263 |
| Foreign Churches | 4 |
| Miscellaneous | 41 |
| | 1,922 |

At the close of 1839, the number of buildings registered was, in England, 1443; in Wales, 135: total 1578. The total number of Marriages solemnized in such buildings was only 4,654; in superintendent registrars' offices, 1564; between Quakers, 73; between Jews, 160. Total 6.451. The slow but steady increase indicates that the New Marriage Act is gradually coming into general operation, but that the Dissenters of England have hitherto very partially availed themselves of the privileges which it confers. Out of nearly 4,000 Independent and Baptist churches, it appears that only 1.259 (1,098 in England, and 161 in Wales), have yet been registered for the solemnization of Marriage. The Wesleyan Methodists have been, for obvious reasons, less eager to have their places registered; whereas the Roman Catholics have 263 registered chapels out of 474, being considerably more than half.

Under these circumstances, it is evident that the number of Marriages solemnized "not according to the rites of the Established Church," cannot afford criterion of the proportionate numbers of the several denominations. No Roman Catholics, it may be presumed, are now married by clergymen of the Church of England; but a large proportion of Dissenters and Methodists are, partly from necessity of circumstances, and from that defect in the law which provides no penalty for neglect of duty on the part of the Registrar,—partly from the force of custom, indifference, or preference, married at the parish church. There is a wicked Spanish proverb relating to the disposition of spaniels, which is too applicable to some Dissenters; but Puseyism has helped on, and will help on, Dissent.

Before we leave this part of the Report, we cannot refrain from drawing the attention of our readers to the fact, that in the agricultural counties, (in which, as regards the present generation, Education is at the lowest point,) the improvidence which leads to early marriages appears to be most prevalent; and these are the counties in which the Established Church enjoys an undisputed dominancy, and possesses the largest portion of territorial wealth with the scantiest population. In these counties, popular ignorance is found of the darkest shade, and ecclesiastical bigotry discovers its worst features of malignity. Those counties which have most uneducated men, have also most churches. Suffolk, which has justly been termed par excellence "the Parson's County," and Essex, which may almost vie with it, rank after Bedfordshire and Monmouthshire as the most uneducated counties.

With regard to the diminution in the number of Marriages during the past year, we can scarcely err in ascribing it, in some degree, to the depressed state of trade and manufactures, and the consequent suffering of the working classes. But a collateral result of this distress, we fear, has been, an increase in the number of illegitimate births. All the Births, the Report states, are not registered, the omissions amounting to several thousands; and the Registrar-General is of opinion, that the registration of births will not be complete, "until it is enacted by law, that the father or mother, or some other qualified informant, shall give notice within a fixed period to the registrar of a birth having taken place." The Report abstains from adverting to the pains taken by many of the clergy to dissuade the lower classes from registering the births of their children, by representing it as optional and needless; but it is obvious that numerous omissions must be ascribed to this cause. The Births are stated to have decreased by 47 in the 100,000 in the last year; and the decrease occurred in all the divisions except the Northern, South-Eastern, and Metropolitan. Yet, the total number of births was 3,046 more than in the year preceding, being 504,543.

The increase in the number of Registered Deaths indicates but too accurately the increased rate of mortality which the destitution of the working classes would prepare us to expect. The number registered (355,622) has exceeded the deaths in the three previous years by 5,521, 24,615, and 19,666, respectively. Taking into account the increase of the population, the mortality of last year slightly exceeded that of the preceding year, but was nearly 6 per cent. above that of 1838-39. The mortality has varied in different parts of the country to an extent ranging from 1,799 to 2,677 annual deaths out of 100,000 living. The mortality was above the average of England (2,114) in the North-Western, Metropolitan, York, and North Midland divisions, and below the average of England in the seven remaining divisions. The mortality was nearly half as high again in the North-Western as in the South-Western division: had it been every where as high as in the former, instead of 355,622 deaths, 449.360 would have occurred last year; and had the mortality of the whole population been as low as in the South-Western counties, the deaths would have been only 302,000. The increase in the mortality appears to have fallen upon the young and the aged, as the mortality of persons between the ages of twenty and sixty has fluctuated very little in the four years.

Such are some of the important deductions from the Returns imbodied in this valuable Report. The Appendix contains, among a mass of tabular and other documents, three Papers submitted to the Registrar-General by William Farr, Esq.: one upon the laws by which the increase of the population is regulated; the second, on the registration and classification of the causes of death; and the third, on the state of the public health in the year 1840.—Pat.

BRAZIL.—Rio de Janeiro papers, up to the 25th of December, contain no political news of interest. It is broadly asserted that, though Mr. Ellis has received marked distinctions from the hands of the Emperor, his mission for a concession of the traffic in slaves will fail. The slave trade is represented as proceeding most actively, and there appears to be but small chance of effectually suppressing it by the presence of our cruisers on the coast.—Ibid.

MORTALITY.—The Quarterly Table of Mortality, in 114 of the principal districts (including nearly all the large towns) of England and Wales has just been published; whence it appears that the average total number of deaths in the four autumns from 1838 to 1841 (inclusive) was 42 003: the total number for the last autumn was 39,368: the quarterly average for the past year, 43,554. These numbers are inclusive of metropolitan mortality, which for the corresponding periods averaged respectively 11,861, 11,631, and 11,318. The population in the metropolitan districts was at the last census 1,870,727; in the entire of the districts included in these returns, 6,534.535. Some things in these statements are startling. Thus, while the mortality of the metropolitan districts is in round numbers 12,000 during the winter quarter, the mortality for the same period in Birmingham was in round numbers 1,000, with a population of only 138,000.—Examiner.

— At Liverpool on Thursday arrived a new steamer, the Hibernia, intended for the British and North American Royal Mail Company. This new ship, from the rate of speed she has attained in her voyage round from the Clyde, may be pronounced the fastest ocean going steamer.—Ibid.

— Specie to a very large amount is now exporting from Liverpool to the United States. The British and North American Royal mail steamer Co-

Caledonia, which sailed on the 4th ult., carried out above 100,000 sovereigns, and the Acadia had on freight not less than 300,000.

—It is affirmed that in the course of this year large reinforcements of troops will be sent to the Dutch possessions in the East Indies; and that 500 men will be sent in the course of next month.—Examiner.

A Liege journal states, that the brother of a shepherd of that place, who died lately at Dork, in Transylvania, has received notice of his being heir to a fortune of 1,500,000f., which his brother has bequeathed to him, but which, in the event of no claim being made by the heir, is to go to the poor of Dork. The shepherd, who is sixty-seven years of age, has refused to touch the legacy, assigning as a reason that he could not be happy with a fortune acquired by a man who, by his misconduct before he left France, had abridged the days of his parents. The cousins of the old man, however, who are less scrupulous, are said to have commenced proceedings against him as a lunatic, so as to be enabled to claim as his representatives.—Record.

BERLIN, JAN. 25.—Our citizens are very glad to learn that the Leipsic Allgemeine Zeitung will be again allowed to circulate here by Easter. It is probable that the editor will be more cautious in future, and it is said that satisfactory promises to this effect have been made.—Ibid.

THE LAW OF EVIDENCE BILL.—Most important alterations are proposed in the Law of Evidence Improvement Bill that has just been introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Chief Justice Denman, and which is to be considered in a Committee of that House to-night (Thursday). The preamble states, that "whereas the inquiry after truth in Courts of Justice is often obstructed by incapacities created by the present law, and it is desirable that full information, as to the facts at issue, both in criminal and civil cases, should be laid before the persons who are appointed to decide upon them, and that such persons should exercise their judgment on the credit of the witnesses adduced, and on the truth of their testimony, Be it enacted," &c. The first clause then provides that witnesses are not to be excluded from giving evidence by incapacity from crime or interest. But this Act is not to repeal any provision in 7 William IV., and 1 Victoria, c. 26; and it is further provided, that in Courts of Equity, defendant may be examined on behalf of the plaintiff, or any co-defendant, and that his interest in the cause shall not be an exception to his testimony. The second clause provides that in legal proceeding it shall not be necessary to state that jurors had made affirmation; and the third and last clause merely enacts that the Act is not to extend to Scotland. —Pat.

VOTE OF THANKS TO LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—The reason of Ministers for fixing this motion so early in the session, one which may prove damaging to themselves, is their anxiety to recall the noble Baron, and they say that this vote of thanks will be "letting him down easy." Originally Lord Ellenborough was sent out to India that he might be out of the way—now they find that he is only the more in it, and they are anxious to rid themselves of him in the best way they can. It is said that the Marquis of Tweeddale—now Governor of Bombay—will be the new Governor-General; this is an appointment not at all unlikely, and one which, from family reasons, arising out of Whig and Tory alliances, would probably not be much cavilled at.—Hants Indep.

THE DEFENCE OF LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—Mr. Vernon Smith having touched on the subject of Lord Ellenborough's proceedings as to the gates of Somnauth, in a very clever speech on a motion for papers, Mr. Bingham Baring entered into a defence of the Governor General, in which he laboured with more zeal than success, and with less scruples than either, to prove that the conduct of Lord Ellenborough had been in every respect in question faultless.

Sir Robert Peel made a speech one-half the one way, one-half the other. The first half was devoted to the defence of Lord Ellenborough, the latter half to a confession of misconduct on his part.

Sir Robert has proceeded in the vindication of his Governor General precisely as Gay recommends people to treat a cucumber, that is, first to dress it with great care, and, when that is done, to throw it away.

In the outset Sir Robert Peel denied the charge of impiety and favouring idolatry, and in candour we must admit that he did succeed in showing that the Governor General had held an even hand between idolatry and Christianity; that, as the homely proverb expresses it, he did not make fish of one and flesh of the other.

Sir Robert pleaded, as a set-off against the proclamation about the honours to the furniture of idolatry, the Circular to the Clergy—

"Entreating them to offer up in their churches, at such convenient time as they might appoint, their humble thanksgiving to Almighty God, to whose paternal goodness and mercy the restoration of the blessing of peace alone was attributable. (Cheers.)"

It is very fortunate that the Governor General, in that Circular to the Clergy, did not desire thanks to be given for the restoration of the gates of the idol, as well as for the blessing of peace, especially as in his proclamation he had treated the recovery of those gates as worth the price of a war, inasmuch as it was boastfully declared the main object and result of it.

If, as Sir Robert Peel would have us, we are to compare the Proclamation and the Circular, the compliment to idolatry and the homage to Christianity, we must confess that there appears much more unction in the former.

But Sir Robert asserts that the gates were to be considered as a military trophy only, and not as any religious symbol. Why, a thing is only a trophy with relation to what have been its uses. A pair of gates carried off from a temple could only be a trophy as the sign of the triumph over, and insult to, a hated creed. The restoration turns the triumph and insult the other way, with the addition of the barbarism of the desecration of a tomb.

If the Duke of Wellington had sent the mitre of the Primate of France to England, it could not have been accepted as a trophy, except as a sign of insult to the Catholic Church.

Both Mr. Bingham Baring and Sir Robert Peel have contended that the Mahometans of India will not feel affronted by the desecration of Muhmoud's tomb, as they delight in the humiliation of their old enemies and vanquishers, the Affghans.

It might as well be argued that any outrageous insult to the Catholic religion, when our army was in France, could not have been unacceptable to the Irish soldiery in her Majesty's service, because they fought the French with as hearty good-will as their Protestant brethren. But what would have been the feelings of the British Catholics if any utensil or vessel devoted to the uses of the Catholic worship had been made a trophy, and paraded as a trophy? They would not have seen in it a trophy in the glory of which they had an equal share; they would have seen in it only a wanton and barbarous insult to their religion, and would have felt that their share in the trophy was only that of disgrace and humiliation. If, then, a trophy can only be such with relation to what have been its uses, whence it has derived its sacredness, value, or importance, it matters not, as far as the question of sentiment is concerned, whether it has changed masters for the first time or not, and in its restoration it carries with it all the offence to religion on the one side that it did in its original capture to the other.

After Sir Robert Peel had disputed the justice of the censures passed on his Governor General,—after he had laboured to show that none of the objections alleged applied to his conduct,—after he had soaped, and rubbed, and scrubbed his blackamore, and taken all pains to make him as white as an angel, out comes the admission with respect to the proclamation—

"He must say, however, with reference to it, that he could not hold one language in that house with regard to it, and another language out of doors (Hear, hear, hear.) He at once admitted that it had attracted the attention of the Government, and it had been thought necessary to make such representations to India with respect to it as were thought necessary. (Hear, hear.) He could not write to the Governor General of India on this subject, and at once publish his opinion, if it carried a free expression of opinion with reference to this subject as a matter of religious dissension, without being aware that it must be attended with very great danger. (Hear, hear.) Indeed, he might add, that in this point of view it was a subject almost too delicate to allude to as a matter of discussion. (Hear, hear.)"

A subject too delicate, indeed! too indelicate he means, the gates of Somnauth having been the gates of the temple of the filthiest obscenity that ever polluted the earth. They had five hundred wives of flesh and blood, being in fact the portals of the priests' harem. They are now in a widowed state, but Lord Ellenborough was not aware of that misfortune.

But, seriously, if Sir Robert Peel saw reason to blame the proclamation in his despatches to the author, why does he now defend it against every objection raised against it? What palpable dishonesty is this; and, after such an example, what is there which these Tory Ministers will not defend in their places in Parliament, even though they may have censured it in their private communications from their official chambers

But after all, says Sir Robert, you are blaming one act of the Governor General,—a remark which provokes the retort of Talleyrand to the same defence; but when is this one act to have an end? It is a piece in one act,—burlesques are never in more than one act,—an extravaganza, like Tom Thumb or Bombastes Furioso; but the one act is intolerably long, and the public begin to cry, Off, off; manager, manager, —an apology, an apology.

Certainly, when Lord Ellenborough sees the turn of Sir Robert Peel's vindication of him, provoking, nay challenging, inquiry into his doings beyond the Somnauth proclamation, he must say, with the character in the School for Scandal, that he feels lost, indeed, when Candour undertakes his defence.

We have defended a part, and an important part, of Lord Ellenborough's administration, the evacuation of Affghanistan (not the barbarities attending it); we had, and we have no disposition to take an unfavourable view of his government, but his enormous and dangerous follies have made the only passage in his policy which we approved (questionable as that was in manner and spirit, though right in the main) appear now but as a lucid interval in a career of madness.

The folly is contagious, and has given rise to the greatest puerility that the House of Commons has perhaps ever been the scene of (manifold and monstrous as its absurdities have been)—the grave controversy about the character of Sultan Mahmoud, who has rested in his tomb for eight centuries!

In order to defend Lord Ellenborough, Sir Robert Peel said some very severe things on the doings of this man of yesterday, Sultan Mahmoud of the eleventh century, the worst of which was that the wealth of India had tempted him to invade it. Our possession of the country is of course referable to a very different motive. Lord Ellenborough shows that we went there only to protect and honour its idolatries.—Examiner.

THE VOTE OF THANKS TO LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—Time was when the word of English gentlemen was as good as their bond; time is when the political life and creed of too many of them are little better than a juggle and a falsehood. The "smart man" school and the school of sophistry and mental reservation are on the ascendant. Our Tory country gentlemen surrendered their consciences last year to Sir Robert Peel, they sold them for a mess of pottage; and he now, therefore, has them on the hip, and will drag them through the dirt gladly and mercilessly, for he bitterly hates them at the bottom of that place where men's hearts usually are. Last session it was their principles and their pledges that he made them sacrifice, this year it is their common sense. He is going to compel them to join him in a vote of thanks to Lord Ellenborough! To Lord Ellenborough?—and for what? We cannot speak accurately as to all this noble Lord's sayings and doings in India until all and more than all the papers about to be furnished by Government are before us; but this we know, that Lord Ellenborough is charged, upon most strong presumptive evidence, with having quailed before the Affghans over whom he now vaunts, by ordering the retreat of our armies just when they were ready to advance, and which order was fortunately neutralized by the spirit of our generals and by some counter orders from home,—with having disregarded the fate of Lady Sale and our prisoners, by commanding the evacuation of Affghanistan before he knew of their recovery, and which recovery was due only to military enterprise favoured by accident,—with disgracing our civilization, by sanctioning the needless destruction of tombs, bazaars, and of towns and villages, with the slaughter of their inhabitants; and one of his own proclamations proves how he fanned this vengeful spirit, for, with the malice of a barbarian superseding the humane dignity of a British Governor, he boasts aloud of leaving the Affghans to the punishment of their own anarchy. And what further illustration can blue books give of folly, ignorance, irreverence, and danger-working mischief, of all the qualities that render a man unfit for authority and command, than the Bedlamite proclamation regarding the obscene temple of Somnauth? Restoring gates which probably were never taken away—which undoubtedly are not the same gates—to a temple whose rites are obscenities too horrid to name, and which happily now is in ruins, and overshadowed by a Mahomedan mosque. All this is well known in India; and yet Lord Ellenborough is sending some of his own personal staff, a detachment of his body guard, and a body of troops to escort for some eight hundred miles, through foreign states, these false and degrading trophies to a degraded temple. The Governor General of India is thus making himself and his country a laughing stock to the acute Hindoos, an insult to the Mahommedans, and a scandal to Christianity. Not content with doing this shame, he publishes it to all India and the world in a proclamation whose tawdry tinsel and arrogance have not been equalled since the days of Nebuchadnezzar, with whom the noble Lord seems to have much in common. This is the man, and these deeds, some incontestably his, and all presumptively so, for whom and for which Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington are going to ask the thanks of the British Parliament. And will they be given? Ay, indeed; honourable Tory gentlemen and Tory lords, who in the bosom of their own families repudiate alike Lord Ellenborough and his proceedings, will not the less, for the sake of their party, prostitute the honoured thanks of their country to him in public; and India may meanwhile take the chance of his further freaks and abominations. And this, then, is the course of the Tory party—of the Conservative, moral, religious party. Where are those whom we have heard making a clamour of "mint, anise, and cumin," but who now will omit the weightier matters of the law, judgment, and faith. To some we willingly render justice. Lord Ashley and Sir Robert Inglis have shown signs of a sense of right warring within them against a sanction, a thanking, of wrong. But how far will this work? —how strong or how persuasive will be the lash of the whipper-in, or the sliding reasons of the Minister? Time will show. Meanwhile the Conservative party is on its trial. The hurry and the novelty of the first session is past, and the country is watching to see how men professing a respect for decency, a regard for the due government of our colonies, and a reverence for the Christian religion, will uphold and defend such proceedings as Lord Ellenborough's.—Examiner.

SIR R. PEEL.—The inhabitants of the town of Greenock, we understand, have prepared an Address to Sir R. Peel, congratulating him on his late escape from assassination, when it was the fate of the unfortunate Mr. Drummond to be murdered by M'Naughten. The document has already been numerously signed by gentlemen belonging to all political parties.—Glasgow Courier.

VALUABLE RELIC.—A valuable good ring, supposed to have belonged to Queen Mary, has lately fallen into the hands of a travelling Jew, named Solomans, residing in Barnardcastle, who appears to have received it, with four pence "to boot," in exchange for some trifling article, from an old housekeeper, who had found it some time ago, and, ignorant of its value, parted with it as above stated. The Jew perceiving some Latin inscription in the inside of the ring, took it to one of the clergymen of the town, to learn the meaning of it, who told him he had reason to believe it was the ring spoken of in history as presented by Queen Elizabeth to the Earl of Essex, and which had been lost. The Reverend gentleman undertook to forward it to the Antiquarian Society of London, who returned it with an intimation that it was not the ring supposed, but they believed it had belonged to Queen Mary, and that the value was somewhere about 250 guineas. It is rumoured that Solomans has since parted with it to the above Society for 350 guineas, but we cannot vouch for the fact.—Newcastle Chronicle.

CANADA.—We have private accounts from Canada by the last packet, which give the most unfavourable reports of the health of Sir Charles Bagot. He had had a relapse, and it was extremely doubtful whether he would live to reach England. The colonists were only doubtful as to the intention of the Home Government to follow up the reforms, and the constitutional conduct of Sir Charles Bagot. The Ministerial party were quietly resting till this important information should be conveyed to them. Some were occupied in arranging the details of proposals to be submitted for the consideration of the new Governor. In the meantime the meetings to address Sir Charles Bagot, condoling with him on account of his unfortunate illness, but approving, in the highest terms, of his recent changes, were taking place throughout Canada, the upper as well as the lower divisions. At the Montreal meeting, presided over by the Hon. D. Viger, the resolutions were moved and seconded equally by the French and British merchants, and the utmost cordiality prevailed amongst them. Mercantile affairs were not looking well, though not so bad as had been anticipated.—Pat. Feb. 27.

GUIZOT'S FETE.—The Moniteur states, that the great fetê given on Wednesday by M. Guizot was one of the most brilliant remembered in Paris. The numerous assembly which crowded the saloons bore unanimous testimony to the good taste and splendour of the fetê, and to the grace with which the honours were done. A portion of the court was filled with exotics, and presented a grove of the most agreeable aspect. "Should M. Guizot fall," observes the Commerce, "he wishes to be buried under flowers."

In the absence of other news, this fête was the subject of general conversation in Paris on Thursday. By some it was described as an entertainment in every respect a l'Anglaise, on account of the number of English present, and also because of the profusion and consumption of viands, champagne, &c. The friends of M. Guizot, with a view no doubt to afford an idea of the favour he enjoyed at court, said that this was one of a series of fêtes which the King had requested him to give in his name, and at his own expense, his Majesty being unable to receive as usual at this season of festivity on account of a Court mourning.—Pat.

TURKISH BARBARITY.—Upon Saturday (says the Constantinople correspondent of the Chronicle) an event occurred which, under ordinary circumstances, would have passed unnoticed. This was the death of Saliha Sultana, sister to the Sultan, and wife of Halil Pasha. It was stated in a former letter, that the barbarous seraglio law, which dooms to death all male issue of the Imperial collateral branches, and which Sultan Mahmoud, in a moment of bitter agony, at the death of his favourite daughter, Bishr on Mah, who being pregnant swallowed drugs in order to anticipate the terrible mandate, was recently revived, and that the infant son of Saliha Sultana, after being allowed to live forty-eight hours, was strangled almost in the mother's arms. This barbarous act produced the most violent effects upon the poor mother, who had flattered herself that her child's life would be saved. Hysterics, fever, and delirium ensued, and, after lingering about two months, she expired on Saturday. The premature death of this princess will, it is to be hoped, produce due effect upon the mind of the Sultan, whose benevolence and kind disposition are universally acknowledged. These events can be no longer kept secret. To the many causes of antipathy and animosity against the Turkish empire, will be added these well-founded accusations. Acts like these, contrary in spirit and letter to the Koran and sacred writings, can find no precedent, no excuse, either in the religion or laws of the country. They had their rise in the barbarous policy of Sultan Suleiman in the sixteenth century. They were the work of a despot in a semi-barbarous age. The progress of civilization in Turkey, and the spirit of the times, forbid a continuation of these horrors. Doubtless, Abdoul Medjid, who has not yet assumed a title as an appendage to his name, will hasten to abolish this atrocious system of child murder, and thus justly earn the designation of the "merciful," a more noble title than that of his father, the "victorious." The young Sultana's remains were intered with great pomp on Saturday, in the splendid mausoleum of the late Sultan her father, near the "burned column."—Pat.

26th April, 1843.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal, in concurrence with the Honourable the President in Council, is pleased to resolve that the following Rule be adopted in modification of Clauses 4 and 5 of the "Rules regarding the Superintendence of Stamp Revenue and the powers of the Board and Revenue Commissioners," prescribed in the Resolution of the Government, dated the 4th August, 1829:

RULE.

The authority vested in Commissioners of Revenue by the 4th and 5th Clauses of the "Rules regarding the Superintendence of the Stamp Revenue and the powers of the Board and Revenue Commissioners," prescribed in the Resolution of the Government, dated the 4th August, 1829, is hereby transferred to the Superintendent of Stamps, to which Officer references by Collectors or other Functionaries in charge of this branch of the Revenue, regarding the affixing of Stamps to unstamped or inadequately stamped Documents shall be made. Collectors or other Functionaries aforesaid, on the presentation of such Documents to be stamped, are required to levy the penalty to which they consider them liable, in addition to the value of the Stamp, or the difference of value when the Document bears a Stamp of inadequate amount. The Documents are then to be transmitted to the Superintendent of Stamps, who, if he concurs in the award of the Collector or other Officer by whom the Documents have been transmitted, will cause them to be properly stamped and returned immediately to that Officer. If the Superintendent shall see cause to differ from the Collector in opinion in regard to the amount of the Stamp to be charged or the penalty to be awarded, he shall without delay refer the proceeding of the Collector, and the reasons for his difference of opinion with that Officer, to the Board of Customs, Salt and Opium, whose decision shall be final. In cases which come by this Rule under the cognizance of the Board of Customs, Salt and Opium, where the decision of the Collector shall be modified or reversed by that authority, the Collector will refund any surcharge or levy any additional penalty, according to the award recorded by the Board. The Board shall nevertheless continue in the exercise of the power with which it is vested by Clause 5 of the Rules that are hereby modified, to remit penalties in excess of the Government Duty, whenever under the circumstances established before that authority, a party subjected to a penalty shall appear to be a fit object for the mitigation thereof.

By order of the Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal,

T. R. DAVIDSON, Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal.

FORT WILLIAM,
FOREIGN DEPARTMENT, 10TH MAY, 1843.
NOTIFICATION.

BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA.

Agra, 29th April, 1843.

The Governor General orders the publication of the following despatch from Major General Sir Charles Napier, K. C. B.

By order of the Right Honourable the Governor General of India.

J. THOMASON, Secy. to Govt. of India,
with the Governor General.

From His Excellency Major General Sir C. J. NAPIER, K. C. B.,

To the Right Honourable LORD ELLENBOROUGH,
Governor General of India,

Camp near Hyderabad, 8th April, 1843.

MY LORD,—I have the honour to enclose to your Lordship the official report of the capture of Oomercote, by the troops under the orders of Major Woodburn.

(Signed) C. J. NAPIER, Governor.

From Major A. WOODBURN,
25th Regt., Comdg. Field Detachment,
To the Assistant Adjutant General,
Scinde Field Force.

Camp near Oomercote, 5th April, 1843.

SIR,—I do myself the honour to report, for the information of Major General Sir Charles Napier, K. C. B., Commanding in Scinde, that agreeably to the instructions conveyed to me by Captain Brown, A. D. C., and which I received at Jourbee at 2 o'clock P. M., on the 2d instant, I marched with the 25th regiment the same afternoon, to join the detachment under Captain Whitlie, then halted at Gooroor, and which place (distant 18 miles) was reached at 11 P. M.

On joining I assumed command of the detachment. After a halt of three hours the whole moved off, and shortly after sunrise encamped at Syud-ke-Thukur, 12 miles from Gooroor. At this place I found considerable difficulty in obtaining any correct information as to whether the fort of Oomercote was occupied by a garrison of the enemy; but from what I could collect from different quarters, I was inclined to suppose it was not held by one of any strength. We marched from Syud-ke-Thukur shortly after midnight, on the morning of the 4th, and found the road an excellent one throughout to this place, and the distance 21 miles: there was Jungle the whole way, occasionally in thick patches, but generally composed of scattered bushes. As Oomercote was approached, the jungle became thicker and higher, so that (the country being a level plain) we did not fairly get in sight of the fort until within about 800 yards of the N. W. bastion. At first no one was seen on the walls, but on nearing it, which I did with a party of horsemen to reconnoitre, some armed men shewed themselves on the bastions. On observing this I directed Captain Jacob to go round to the eastern face of the fort with his regiment of Scinde horse, for the purpose of preventing the escape of the garrison, if they wished to do so to induce them to shew their strength if they were inclined to defend themselves. In the mean time the heads of the Hindoo population of the town of Oomercote came out and expressed their pleasure at the arrival of British troops and made their submission. By them I was informed that, the greatest part of the garrison having fled some days before, there were few men now in the fort, and they did not mean to resist, but would evacuate it on a guarantee being given that their lives would be spared. I desired Lieutenant Fitzgerald, of the Scinde horse, to go and inform them their lives should be spared, on condition that they came out and laid down their arms. While he was doing so, I directed Captain Whitlie to bring up his guns and place them in position, as I concluded the sight of them would hasten the determinations of the garrison. The infantry was also brought forward and halted under cover of some trees. By the time these arrangements were made the garrison opened the gates, and, coming out, laid down their arms and gave up the keys, giving thus into our possession a most important and strong fortress, having eleven guns mounted, and its defences in excellent order, without the effusion of a single drop of blood. Lieutenant Noyle immediately took possession with his company of the 21st regiment.

I have ordered Captain Jacob to leave behind a squadron of the Scinde horse under a European officer, who, with the above company, are to garrison the place. In leaving a company of infantry, in addition to the squadron, I have made the garrison stronger than I find was intended by the Major General in his instructions to my predecessor in command.

Captain Whitlie assured me a squadron alone was directed to be left. I beg however to submit for the Major General's consideration, that foraging parties will, from all I can hear, be obliged to go often to the distance of many miles and will require to be in strength, as there are now many parties of the followers of the Ameer Shere Mahomed, scattered about the country, as well as others of different tribes hostile to us, who are always to be met with where forage is most plentiful. To make these foraging parties sufficiently strong, might, were a squadron left alone, often leave too small a garrison in the fort; and on this account I have been induced to add the infantry, so as to admit of all the cavalry being absent at one time when such is required.

The town under the walls, and on the east side of the fort, contains about 1,000 houses with a well supplied bazar. The inhabitants are Rajpoots, banians and other Hindoos, all calling themselves Marwarrees, and they profess to be friendly to us, and to detest their former rulers the Ameers of Scinde. These professions appear to me to be sincere. At all events they placed great confidence in us, as on the approach of our troops, they did not remove either their families or property out of the town. and the men and children mixed themselves up among our people, before we got possession of the fort in a most friendly and confident way. I mention this not only to shew their present feeling towards us, but also, if I may be allowed to make the suggestion, how beneficial it will be to any garrison placed at Oomercote, if means are adopted to encourage its continuance, as much not only of the comfort, but also the very safety of the garrison may depend on their remaining bound to us by such a strong tie. There is every appearance of the garrison getting provisions. I left all I had to spare, after setting aside a sufficiency for the use of the detachment on its march to Hyderabad. The supply so left, will afford rations to 300 native soldiers for sixty days.

I have ordered a Hospital Assistant provided with a supply of medicine to be left with the garrison.

Enclosed I beg to forward a return made by Captain Whitlie, of the guns and ammunition found in the fortress; and in a day or two I expect to send a survey and report of the fort, now being prepared by Captain Henderson, of the Madras Engineers.

I have, &c.,

(Signed) A. WOODBURN, Major,
25th Regt. Comdg. Field Detachment.

P. S. I observe I have omitted to mention, that the heat of the weather has been very great, and the marches long and fatiguing ones, and from these causes, as well as a scarcity of good water, the troops have had much to bear up against. I am happy, however, to say, all has been done cheerfully, and at the end of each march there has been hardly a man out of his place.

(Signed) A. WOODBURN.

WM. MOORE,

The 11th May, 1843.

THE APRIL MAIL from London of the 6th of that month reached Calcutta on Monday morning, and has been pronounced barren. Yet it announces a second fire at Liverpool, in which property to the extent of more than 50,000£ has been destroyed; and a destructive earthquake in the West Indies, which has spread desolation among some of the islands, subverting houses and manufactories, and depriving the planters of the hopes of the season, which were peculiarly flattering. It announces that the Brazilian Government has refused to accede to the terms of the Commercial treaty proposed by Sir Robert Peel, and has threatened to close against us a market of five millions sterling a year, unless its coffee and sugar are admitted into England upon the same terms with the produce of our own colonies. It tells us that the French Government has taken possession of the Otaheite Islands; an event which will we fear put an end to one of the most successful of Protestant Missions. It reports a very warlike speech of the President of the United States, in which the right of 'search', as it is called,—or rather the right to ascertain whether a vessel on the African coast, hoisting American colours, be not in reality an English vessel, violating English laws,—is alluded to in terms bordering on arrogance. The Mail announces that the aerial steam ship is ready, and it gives us a drawing of it, and what is more to the purpose, explains the principles on which it is to be set and kept in motion, thereby diminishing to no inconsiderable extent the scepticism with which it was viewed. The Mail announces also that Her Majesty's accouchement was expected about the middle of April, and that the king of Hanover intended to visit England, and remain there six weeks,—doubtless with the view of examining the singular phenomenon of a Conservative Ministry acting on liberal principles. Then the Mail announces that the Income tax, from which Sir Robert Peel expected to obtain about three millions and a half a year, is likely to yield double that sum. It also announces that the ecclesiastical Court has deprived the Right Honourable John Wilson Croker, of the legacy of two lakhs and a half of Rupees which that hoary voluptuary, the Marquis of Hertford, had bequeathed him. It announces the death of the greatest of modern "men of letters," the biographer of Nelson, Dr. Southey, and the refusal of the butt of sack and the Laureatship by Wordsworth, on the plea of age—We hope it will not be given away before our friend D. L. R., reaches England—It informs us that the most stupendous work in this age of wonders, the Thames Tunnel, has been completed, and that it was open to foot passengers for the first time on the 25th of March. It states that the affairs of the Kirk have reached the crisis, and that 474 Ministers are prepared to quit the establishment, and throw themselves on the voluntary contributions of the people. It tells it how the Ministry having, as it is said, received three millions sterling from the Chinese Government as a compensation for the Opium which Lin destroyed, intend to give the merchants less than one million, or at the rate of 45 Pounds Sterling a chest, and to keep the other two millions to pay the expenses of the war, which compelled the Chinese to make good the loss. Surely a mail with intelligence so interesting to all classes, and so varied, cannot be called barren.

The Comet has been seen in Europe and in America, and has excited, as might have been expected, the astonishment of the astronomical world. It was observed in America on the 5th March; in Paris and in England on the 16th, Thursday. It was seen in this neighbourhood for the first time on Monday, the 6th of March; the London Mail says it was seen also at Nice Mauritius, in the southern hemisphere on the 16th, but this must be a misprint, no intelligence from the Mauritius of the 16th March could have reached England on the 6th of April, except by the Aerial Steam Carriage, which had not started when the Mail left London.

The American Government is about, they say, to send an Embassy to Pekin to conclude a Commercial treaty with the Imperial Cabinet, and Mr. Everett is spoken of as the Envoy. Congress has voted 40,000 dollars for this object. We hope the Envoy will meet with success. A second treaty with the European family will contribute to draw China into closer connection with the civilized world, and render a return to its own exclusive policy more difficult. There can be little doubt that the Grande Nation will not allow itself long to remain behind its neighbours; an embassy on a grand and imposing scale, with a long cortege of savans, will doubtless be voted by acclamation in the Chambers to protect French interests in the Empire of China. Neither is it to be expected that Russia will lose the opportunity of obtaining a firmer footing in Pekin. The unhappy Son of Heaven, besieged successively by four sets of the outside barbarians, will find himself, 'intensely' perplexed how to act, and will more than ever rue the day when Lin, by confiscating the opium, opened the country to strangers.

But the most interesting intelligence brought by this Mail, is that of the debates in both Houses of Parliament regarding the Somnath Gate Proclamation. The Opposition was of course beaten; and a majority both of the Lords and Commons have affirmed by their votes that there is nothing whatever worthy of censure in them. Not with more utter surprize did the poor barber behold Don Fernando, and the other inmates of the Hotel, maintain with all gravity that his bason was in very truth Mambrino's helmet, than the public of India will learn on the authority of Parliament that the Proclamation is perfectly right and proper, only a little oriental in its style. The defence of the Proclamation is more extraordinary than the document itself; which can be easily accounted for. With all Lord Ellenborough's rapidity and clearness of conception, and all his cleverness,—and few of his bitterest enemies deny him these qualifications,—he seems to want that calm equanimity, which is so essential to greatness. The report of General England's repulse in April last, confounded him, and in a moment of panic he ordered the army to withdraw; the success of the campaign on the other hand elated him beyond the bounds of reason. He was resolved to make the most of his victories; and he has made so much of them, as to expose himself to the present and future ridicule of mankind. The possession of the Gates destroyed the equilibrium of his mind. He thought of, talked of, dreamt of, nothing else. He fondled the toy with the raptures of a child. That he never intended to encourage idolatry or to insult Christianity by the Proclamation is beyond doubt, for when he had given it the third touch, he flattered himself that even Sir Harry Inglis could find no flaw in it. He thought only of producing a mighty and sublime effect throughout India, and he has given us another exemplification of the truth, that between the sublime and the ridiculous there is but a step. If his Lordship had adhered to his original idea of exhibiting the gates only as a military trophy, and put forth a dignified proclamation, pointing to these trophies as the evidence of our triumph on the scene of our disasters, and established them at Benares, where the representative of almost every chief in India is to be found, he would have deserved the approbation of society. But the inflated Proclamation, written in a moment of unnatural ecstacy, marred the whole proceeding. That such a Proclamation should be not only excused, but in some measure defended by the Senators of Great Britain, the Conscript Fathers of the Commonwealth, in their calm and sedate moments—shows with how little wisdom the world is governed.

THE VERNACULAR DECREE AND ORDER ACT.—The draft of an Act has just been published relative to the language and time in which all decrees and orders of the Courts shall be written. It provides that the essential portion of every decree, the points at issue, the order passed, and the reasons for passing it, shall be written by the English Judges in the English language, and by the Native Judges in their own vernacular tongue, and signed at the time of passing the decree. This document is immediately to be translated into the language of the Court, and the translation is to form a part of the decree. Of course where the vernacular tongue of the Judge and the language current in his Court happen to be the same, no translation will be requisite. The same rule is to be followed regarding the orders which may be passed, on Summary or Special appeals, and on applications for a Review of judgement.

This Act bears on the face of it the stamp of improvement. It is intended to correct irregularities which have disfigured our judicial institu-

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 18.

— The Star has a long and interesting article on Cooly emigration to the Mauritius in this morning's issue. The Government of the Mauritius has resolved to increase the indemnity for passage money between Calcutta and the island from 60 to 70 Rupees; and to give 5 per cent additional indemnity for every adult labourer, whenever the number of females shall be in the proportion of five to every one hundred male labourers brought over in the same ships, over and above the number of ten females for every one hundred male labourers, for which ten females the indemnity will not be applicable, provided the females be between the ages of 10 and 30; but no indemnity will be paid for any number beyond 25. The Star also gives details of the expences attending the shipment of the Coolies, and the return obtained from the Government of the Island. The system which has now grown up, and which gives a bonus on crimping, appears very different from that which the Order in Conneil contemplated. Our contemporary has promised to return to the system, and to exhibit the discordance between it and the Order. We shall postpone our own editorial remarks till we see his observations.

— The Hindostan arrived at Galle on the 24th April. Her progress had not been so rapid as on her return from Suez. A passenger talks of being 22 days from Galle to that place, which will not a little disappoint our expectations. She was to remain the better part of three days at Galle, owing to the difficulty of taking in coal. A similar delay is, we fear, to be expected at Aden, and thus the superior advantages of speed which this vessel enjoys, will be in a great measure neutralized.

— The Englishman mentions a report that the Revenual Deputy Collectorships, are actually, or are about to be, abolished. Upon what authority this rumour is founded, we know not. Perhaps the writer intends to draw a line of distinction between the Deputy Collectors employed in Resumptions, and those employed in the ordinary fiscal duties of a district. The former were appointed for a temporary object, which having been for the most part completed, their services are no longer necessary. But to suppose that the permanent office of Deputy Collector, is to be abolished and that revenual duties are to be conducted by the Covenanted service without assistance, is, we think, preposterous.

— The Editor of the late United Service Journal has just started a new paper at Bombay called the World. We have been able to find room only for the first part of his opening address, which however will serve as a sample of the spirit and ability with which it is likely to be conducted. Strange to say, the paper is started upon Conservative principles.

— The Englishman, in reply to a correspondent, states that Sir G. Napier, Governor of the Cape, Sir Chas. Napier, Governor of Scinde, and Genl. W. F. P. Napier, the Peninsular Historian, are brothers. Commodore Sir Chas. Napier is a cousin of the above distinguished men.

FRIDAY, MAY 19.

— The suspension, and we trust final abolition, of the State Lottery has not delivered the country from this plague of gambling. The Englishman of this morning publishes in addition to the Scheme of Lattey, Brothers and Co. which embraces not only sundry articles of jewellery, which cannot otherwise obtain a sale, but 45,000 Rs. of Cash prizes, another Lottery by Methold and Co. upon the same gigantic scale as the Government Lottery. The value of the Prizes is stated at 5,00,000; the profits to the Projectors, at 10,000 Rs. or less than two Per Cent. The projectors state, that the Lottery has been projected under the auspices and patronage of the most respectable agency and mercantile Houses in Calcutta. Who are these "most respectable Houses" who patronize the Durrumtollah Lottery?

— The Englishman states, that the whole of the Secretarial Department has been actually ordered up the country by Lord Ellenborough. If so, of course the Council of India must accompany them, and thus leave Calcutta to Mr. Bird, the Deputy Governor, Mr. Halliday the Secretary, and the two Under Secretaries. Notwithstanding the confidence with which the fact is announced, we have many doubts on the subject. Is the Council and the Secretariat to be fixed, while Lord Ellenborough is ambulatory? If so, it would be more convenient for them to remain in Calcutta, where the records of Government must remain. If they are to travel in his Lordship's company, we think their first journey will be their last. The Court will not put up with the expense, nor the peripatetic Council with the inconvenience.

— The Ameer Daood Khan, the most dangerous of the Scinde Ameers, and the individual who is supposed to have instigated the murder of Capt. Ennis, has been sent under a strong guard to Surat.

— The Star details the difficulties into which the Gilbert Henderson, a Cooly ship, fell on her arrival at Port Louis. It appears that the Captain having proceeded some way down the river, found nineteen of the Coolies missing; and immediately reported the matter to the Agents in Calcutta, who sent down thirteen men and a woman to supply their place. Their names were not borne on the counterpart list signed by the Emigration Agent in Calcutta, though each of them was provided with a certificate from Mr. Fraser. The Governor of the Mauritius has ordered the Captain to be prosecuted for a breach of the 10th Clause of the Indian Act, and the penalty will probably be 7000 Rs.

— Dost Mahomed is said to experience no little difficulty in his attempt to get through the Khyber Pass. They demand three lakhs of Rupees, and it is reported that all Akbar Khan's eloquence has not prevailed on them to abate a farthing.

— The Calcutta Gazette has just published two Acts, the object of which is to assimulate the judicial system at the Madras Presidency, as far as possible, with that which prevails here.

SATURDAY, MAY 20.

— The intelligence from Bombay regarding Scinde is any thing but agreeable. It is true that Sir Charles Napier is himself a host, and commands troops accustomed to victory, but he has no hold in the country except on the ground on which he is encamped. He is perfectly isolated at Hydrabad. The country above and below it is in the hands of an invisible but ubiquitous foe. He can communicate with Kurachee only by water; and his connection with Sukkur is as much interrupted as though the Khoord Cabul or Khybar intervened. The Ameer, who was supposed to have fled to Bekaneer, is said to be within five marches of his camp with a large party of Beloches, who are loth to relinquish their hold on the valley of the Indus. H. M's. 28th has been ordered up from Kurachee, and Sir Charles intends, it is said, to march in search of the enemy on its arrival. The Jam, or chief in the vicinity of Kurachee, who has been the cause of so much annoyance, is reported to have made his submission.

— The Star has information that Dost Mahomed had actually reached Cabul, though in very ill health. The Newaub Zeman Khan had fled with his family to Koodboom. The Kohistanees had risen in favour of Zeman Khan, and Ameenoolla was in rebellion in the Loghur district. Akbar Khan was at Jellalabad with Shumsooddeen, but they did not well agree. One of the Dost's first acts was to imprison Nazir Wahab. He has returned to a ruined country governed by refractory chiefs. All the bonds of society have been torn asunder, and require to be reconstructed. It would not be a matter of surprize if his aged frame should sink under the prospect of his difficulties.

— Capt. Charles Guthrie, of the Invalids, who held a staff appointment at Dinapore, has died on his way to the Presidency for surgical aid. His leg required to be amputated; and it is said that there either was no Surgeon at the station competent to perform the operation, or that there were no instruments. The Englishman has taken up the subject, and the medical men at the station cannot let it drop; it too nearly affects their honour: they will explain wherein lay the difficulty which sent the Captain four hundred miles to Calcutta for so simple a surgical operation.

— Baboo Ashootosh Deb, one of the most opulent merchants in Calcutta, having added greatly to the immense wealth his father left him, is going on pilgrimage to Juggernath, with a long train of attendants, perhaps not fewer than five hundred.

— A question has been raised, whether a Student of the Medical College who has received a certificate of qualifications, can charge a fee or not for medical attendance. The case has been brought before the Court of Requests, but the consideration of it has been, it is said, postponed pending a reference to Counsel.

— At the last meeting of Magistrates, Baboo Dishonath Mooteeloll made this honest confession regarding the efforts to establish a Municipal Committee. In rather a lugubrious strain he intimated, that it would be useless to hold more meetings, unless Europeans and other classes of tax-payers were called in to co-operate with the Committee; as at the meetings hitherto held, only a small number of bonâ fide rate-payers have attended, but the meeting has been principally crowded by boys and young men, and the business much obstructed by a parcel of Hindoo College boys, who have done nothing but thump the table! As the intimation was given orally, the Justices requested the Baboo to commit what he had said to writing, and to send it up in the form of a report.

MONDAY, MAY 22.

— The Hurkaru of this morning denies that it was originally intended to confer the office of Uncovenanted Judge on natives alone, and endeavours to refute this idea by the fact, that within a few months after the Regulation was passed, several gentlemen, not Natives, were appointed to this situation. We were engaged in re-examining the subject, when the Express came in, and put an end to our labours. It is rather a personal than a public question; but we do not like to be driven out of the field, and shall return to it at a convenient season.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that Mr. G. Clerk is about to proceed to the Hills, for six months, on account of his health, and that Col. Richmond, of the 33d Native Infantry, will act for him. We hope this temporary relaxation from his arduous and incessant labours, will result in the complete restoration of Mr. Clerk's health, for the services of no member of Government could be less spared at the present moment than those of the Envoy to the Court at Lahore.

— The death of Lieut. Col. Skinner, of H. M. 31st Regiment, is also reported in the Delhi Gazette. He died of a disease contracted in the last Affghan campaign. His death is regretted by all as a public and a private loss. He was the brother of the gallant Capt. Skinner, who fell in the disastrous retreat from Cabul, and by whose death the public service was deprived of one of its greatest ornaments.

— There is in this morning's Englishman an admirable letter by N. A. C. on the defects and abuses of the Police. Will he excuse the freedom of our asking him, to explain in a brief note in that paper, where the sentences in the second column beginning with "On these persons" and ending with the "risk of detection," and which are marked as a quotation, are to be found. Let him give in few words the chief duties to which the attention of the Deputy Magistrates should be directed. If this idea could be effectually carried out into practise, the judicial duties of the Magistracy would be wonderfully contracted.

— A letter in the Englishman, from the Kishnaghur districts says that notwithstanding the splendid, the unexampled weather, we have had not a week without a shower,—there cannot be more than a middling crop of indigo. When will planters be satisfied with their prospects?

— Scinde is to have a Printing Press. The Gentleman's Gazette says, " Instead of a grand zenana the Capital of the Ex-Ameers is about to have a Printing Press for the Europeans and one for the sons of Asia. The Lithograph Press appears to be destined to be the civilizer of the Mahomedans." Why does not the Gentleman's Gazette proceed to the Capital of the Ex-Ameers, and give Scinde the benefit also of a public journal?

TUESDAY, MAY 23.

— The Opium sale yesterday exhibited a very extraordinary spectacle in the eagerness with which the drug was bought up by speculators at prices which the late accounts from China will by no means warrant. The average of the Behar Opium was 1516 Rs. of the Benares 1800 Rs; the entire proceeds of the sale, more than twenty-eight lakhs of Rupees. This sale took place within an hour after intelligence had been received of the effort made in Parliament to close the Company's monopoly.

— A French Frigate, with presents on board for Tharawaddy, arrived some little time ago at Rangoon, the ultimate object being a commercial treaty, which that monarch will probably be less disposed to grant the French than the English. A French merchant vessel had arrived there some time before, the commander of which experienced some ill treatment. The Captain of the Frigate on hearing of it, retained the presents and set sail for Bourbon, from which he may return with reinforcements and blow the town to pieces.

— The announcement in the Englishman that Messrs. Mackay and Co. had bought the India, is contradicted. They are building a Steamer of their own to run between China, the Straits and Calcutta. The Express has brought intelligence that the keel of the vessel has been laid down, that the stern is up, and the forebody in frame. She will be of 750 tons burden and 150 horse power, and will carry sixteen passengers, besides 120 tons of cargo and coal. She will probably be 10 days in going to Singapore and 20 to China.

— The Englishman hints that it has been rumoured that there is some little backwardness on the part of Tudor, the Ice King, to keep up a constant supply of that article. If so, we must look to Chinsurah, or perhaps get up a little wholesome competition.

— The Madras United Service Gazette says, that the Tenasserim was expected there about the 15th instant. She would probably have brought up Sir Hugh Gough, who will supersede Sir Jasper Nicolls, if he had not been ill.

— The Pluto and the Nemesis Steamers have passed through the Paumbum Channel. This is the first instance of a Steamer's having used this channel since it was deepened. They both got through with perfect ease and without the smallest accident.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24.

— The Agri-Horticultural Society of Allahabad is about to be dissolved in consequence of the removal of the Sudder Court and Sudder Board to Allahabad.

— A female beggar in Calcutta, who has contrived to amass 200 Rs. by her mendicity and mendacity, has been relieved of the sum by some rogues.

— The Madras papers state, that a Magistrate who has been considered for many years among the most able and impartial on the Bench, is to be dismissed from Office.

— At the half yearly Meeting of the Bonded Warehouse Association on Monday last, a dividend at the rate of Ten Rupees per share was declared, which is at the rate of Four per cent. per annum; a sum not likely to raise the price of shares in the market.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

FORT WILLIAM, FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT,
17TH MAY, 1843.

The Hon'ble the President in Council, with the concurrence of the Right Hon'ble the Governor General, has revised the Rules published on 29th January 1840, for the grant of leave of absence, and for regulating deductions from Salaries, and Deputation Allowances. The following Rules will have effect from this date for regulating Deputation Allowances, and the terms on which leave of absence will be given to places situated within the limits of the respective Presidencies, to which the Applicants are attached.

Sec. VI. (Amended.) Civil Servants absent from their Stations under Medical Certificate, within the limits of their respective Presidencies, shall be entitled to the Salaries of their Offices for the period of two years, subject to a deduction of ⅓d for the whole term of such absence, save and excepted that for the first year, if the Salary be not more than 500 Rupees per mensem, no deduction shall be made, and if it be only so much more than 500 Rupees that the prescribed deduction of ⅓d would reduce the allowance below that sum, only the excess beyond Rs. 500 shall be deducted, but for the second year, the full deduction shall be in force. An absent Servant, whether Civil or Military, shall in no case retain any Civil Office or employment, nor be permitted to draw any portion of official Salary for longer period than two years, but a Civil Servant who may, on account of sickness duly certified, obtain an extension of leave beyond two years shall, if his period of actual residence be less than 12 years, be allowed to draw the second rate of subsistence allowance, and if the period of such actual residence be 12 years, the highest rate of subsistence allowance, but if he continue absent in disobedience of an order to return, or without sufficient cause shewn, that allowance also shall be forfeited. The period of absence shall be computed from the date of his quitting his Station to the date of his return thereto.

Sec. XI. (Amended.) The Government of each Presidency may grant to Civil or Military Servants holding Civil appointments leave of absence for one month in each year without deduction from the Salaries and Emoluments drawn by such Servants. Such leave however will only be granted when the Government is satisfied that no inconvenience or expense will arise from the departure of the Officer seeking it. No second leave can be granted under this rule until the completion of eleven months from the expiration of the last leave.

Sec. XII. (Amended.) The Government of each Presidency may, on sufficient cause being shewn, grant to a Civil or Military Officer holding a Civil Office special leave of absence on private affairs. Provided however that if any Officer to whom such leave shall be granted shall be absent from his Station for any period exceeding that to which under the last rule he may be entitled without deduction, the Absentee if a Civil Servant shall for the period in excess draw no more than one-half of his Salary and Allowances, and if a Military Officer only so much of the Salary and Allowances of any Civil Office to which he may stand appointed as added to the Military Pay and Allowances which he may be entitled to draw shall equal one-half of his entire Military and Civil emoluments. After an absence of three months (exclusive of any period which may be granted under Sec. XI.) any Office held by the Absentee shall become vacant.

Sec. XIII. is rescinded.

Sec. XVIII. (Amended.) The sum of Company's Rupees 52,200 per annum, having been fixed under the orders of the Court of Directors as the Maximum Salary of Civil Office for the Offices of Government under the situation of Member of Council—Civil and Military Servants holding Office in the Political Department, who may draw larger Allowances than this annual sum as a consolidated personal and sumptuary allowance in consideration of the necessary expences of their position, will in all cases of absence be treated in respect to deductions as drawing only the Allowance thus limited, and the excess above the monthly salary yielded by that annual sum, shall remain as a local addition to the usual Deputation Allowance to be drawn by the Officer performing the duties to meet the necessary expences of his position.

Note.—This rule will equally apply in case of a Political Resident taking a leave of one month for which in other cases he would suffer no deduction.—The excess above the maximum monthly salary will in that case be enjoyed by the person in charge.

Section XIX. (Amended.) Deputation Allowances shall be granted to Civil Servants temporarily performing the duties of an Office according to the following rates, and subject to the limitations and conditions hereinafter laid down.

Note.—Military persons acting for other Military persons holding Civil Office, will, as in the case of staff, draw half the difference between the incumbent's Military Allowances and the consolidated Civil Salary as at present, that is, will draw the amount retrenched from the Absentee, but when acting for a Civil Servant they will draw at the rates and under the same rules as Civil Servants.

To Civil Servants not holding any substantive Appointment.

At the rate of 25 per Cent. on the Monthly Salary of the appointment officiated in, such Deputation Allowance being in addition to the Subsistence Allowance of their respective ranks.

To Civil Servants holding an Office of inferior emolument when Officiating for a Superior.

At the rate of 10 per Cent. upon the monthly Salary of the appointment officiated in, in all cases in which the Salary of such appointment shall not exceed Co.'s Rs. 2,000 per mensem, and in respect to all appointments of which the Salary shall be more than Co.'s Rs. 2,000 per mensem, at the rate of 10 per Cent. upon Co.'s Rs. 2,000, and of 5 per Cent. on the amount in which the monthly Salary may exceed Co.'s Rs. 2,000; provided however that no lower rate of Deputation Allowance shall be given than 100 Rs. per mensem.

The Deputation Allowance shall in all cases be in addition to the Salary of the substantive appointment held by the Officer on deputation.

A Civil Servant acting for another shall have no claim to Commission or Fees, where any such sources of emolument exist. These shall be regarded as forming part of the income of the Officer to be relieved, subject to the prescribed deductions.

Sec. XXI. (Amended.) No Subordinate Officer acting for his Principal or for any other person holding a superior appointment in the same Office or Establishment, at the same Station, shall be entitled to any Deputation Allowance until af-

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 18.

— The Star has a long and interesting article on Cooly emigration to the Mauritius in this morning's issue. The Government of the Mauritius has resolved to increase the indemnity for passage money between Calcutta and the island from 60 to 70 Rupees; and to give 5 per cent additional indemnity for every adult labourer, whenever the number of females shall be in the proportion of five to every one hundred male labourers brought over in the same ships, over and above the number of ten females for every one hundred male labourers, for which ten females the indemnity will not be applicable, provided the females be between the ages of 10 and 30; but no indemnity will be paid for any number beyond 25. The Star also gives details of the expences attending the shipment of the Coolies, and the return obtained from the Government of the Island. The system which has now grown up, and which gives a bonus on crimping, appears very different from that which the Order in Council contemplated. Our contemporary has promised to return to the system, and to exhibit the discordance between it and the Order. We shall postpone our own editorial remarks till we see his observations.

— The Hindoostan arrived at Galle on the 24th April. Her progress had not been so rapid as on her return from Suez. A passenger talks of being 22 days from Galle to that place, which will not a little disappoint our expectations. She was to remain the better part of three days at Galle, owing to the difficulty of taking in coal. A similar delay is, we fear, to be expected at Aden, and thus the superior advantages of speed which this vessel enjoys, will be in a great measure neutralized.

— The Englishman mentions a report that the Revenual Deputy Collectorships, are actually, or are about to be, abolished. Upon what authority this rumour is founded, we know not. Perhaps the writer intends to draw a line of distinction between the Deputy Collectors employed in Resumptions, and those employed in the ordinary fiscal duties of a district. The former were appointed for a temporary object, which having been for the most part completed, their services are no longer necessary. But to suppose that the permanent office of Deputy Collector, is to be abolished and that revenual duties are to be conducted by the Covenanted service without assistance, is, we think, preposterous.

— The Editor of the late United Service Journal has just started a new paper at Bombay called the World. We have been able to find room only for the first part of his opening address, which however will serve as a sample of the spirit and ability with which it is likely to be conducted. Strange to say, the paper is started upon Conservative principles.

— The Englishman, in reply to a correspondent, states that Sir G. Napier, Governor of the Cape, Sir Chas. Napier, Governor of Scinde, and Genl. W. F. P. Napier, the Peninsular Historian, are brothers. Commodore Sir Chas. Napier is a cousin of the above distinguished men.

FRIDAY, MAY 19.

— The suspension, and we trust final abolition, of the State Lottery has not delivered the country from this plague of gambling. The Englishman of this morning publishes in addition to the Scheme of Lattey, Brothers and Co. which embraces not only sundry articles of jewellery, which cannot otherwise obtain a sale, but 45,000 Rs. of Cash prizes, another Lottery by Methold and Co. upon the same gigantic scale as the Government Lottery. The value of the Prizes is stated at 5,00,000; the profits to the Projectors, at 10,000 Rs. or less than two Per Cent. The projectors state, that the Lottery has been projected under the auspices and patronage of the most respectable agency and mercantile Houses in Calcutta. Who are these "most respectable Houses" who patronize the Durrumtollah Lottery?

— The Englishman states, that the whole of the Secretarial Department has been actually ordered up the country by Lord Ellenborough. If so, of course the Council of India must accompany them, and thus leave Calcutta to Mr. Bird, the Deputy Governor, Mr. Halliday the Secretary, and the two Under Secretaries. Notwithstanding the confidence with which the fact is announced, we have many doubts on the subject. Is the Council and the Secretariat to be fixed, while Lord Ellenborough is ambulatory? If so, it would be more convenient for them to remain in Calcutta, where the records of Government must remain. If they are to travel in his Lordship's company, we think their first journey will be their last. The Court will not put up with the expense, nor the peripatetic Council with the inconvenience.

— The Ameer Daood Khan, the most dangerous of the Scinde Ameers, and the individual who is supposed to have instigated the murder of Capt. Ennis, has been sent under a strong guard to Surat.

— The Star details the difficulties into which the Gilbert Henderson, a Cooly ship, fell on her arrival at Port Louis. It appears that the Captain having proceeded some way down the river, found nineteen of the Coolies missing: and immediately reported the matter to the Agents in Calcutta, who sent down thirteen men and a woman to supply their place. Their names were not borne on the counterpart list signed by the Emigration Agent in Calcutta, though each of them was provided with a certificate from Mr. Fraser. The Governor of the Mauritius has ordered the Captain to be prosecuted for a breach of the 10th Clause of the Indian Act, and the penalty will probably be 7000 Rs.

— Dost Mahomed is said to experience no little difficulty in his attempt to get through the Khyber Pass. They demand three lakhs of Rupees, and it is reported that all Akbar Khan's eloquence has not prevailed on them to abate a farthing.

— The Calcutta Gazette has just published two Acts, the object of which is to assimulate the judicial system at the Madras Presidency, as far as possible, with that which prevails here.

SATURDAY, MAY 20.

— The intelligence from Bombay regarding Scinde is any thing but agreeable. It is true that Sir Charles Napier is himself a host, and commands troops accustomed to victory, but he has no hold in the country except on the ground on which he is encamped. He is perfectly isolated at Hydrabad. The country above and below it is in the hands of an invisible but ubiquitous foe. ## CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

FORT WILLIAM, FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT,
17TH MAY, 1843.

The Hon'ble the President in Council, with the concurrence of the Right Hon'ble the Governor General, has revised the Rules published on 29th January 1840, for the grant of leave of absence, and for regulating deductions from Salaries, and Deputation Allowances. The following Rules will have effect from this date for regulating Deputation Allowances, and the terms on which leave of absence will be given to places situated within the limits of the respective Presidencies, to which the Applicants are attached.

Sec. VI. (Amended.) Civil Servants absent from their Stations under Medical Certificate, within the limits of their respective Presidencies, shall be entitled to the Salaries of their Offices for the period of two years, subject to a deduction of ½d for the whole term of such absence, save and excepted that for the first year, if the Salary be not more than 500 Rupees per mensem, no deduction shall be made, and if it be only so much more than 500 Rupees that the prescribed deduction of ½d would reduce the allowance below that sum, only the excess beyond Rs. 500 shall be deducted, but for the second year, the full deduction shall be in force. An absent Servant, whether Civil or Military, shall in no case retain any Civil Office or employment, nor be permitted to draw any portion of official Salary for longer period than two years, but a Civil Servant who may, on account of sickness duly certified, obtain an extension of leave beyond two years shall, if his period of actual residence be less than 12 years, be allowed to draw the second rate of subsistence allowance, and if the period of such actual residence be 12 years, the highest rate of subsistence allowance, but if he continue absent in disobedience of an order to return, or without sufficient cause shewn, that allowance also shall be forfeited. The period of absence shall be computed from the date of his quitting his Station to the date of his return thereto.

Sec. XI. (Amended.) The Government of each Presidency may grant to Civil or Military Servants holding Civil appointments leave of absence for one month in each year without deduction from the Salaries and Emoluments drawn by such Servants. Such leave however will only be granted when the Government is satisfied that no inconvenience or expense will arise from the departure of the Officer seeking it. No second leave can be granted under this rule until the completion of eleven months from the expiration of the last leave.

Sec. XII. (Amended.) The Government of each Presidency may, on sufficient cause being shewn, grant to a Civil or Military Officer holding a Civil Office special leave of absence on private affairs. Provided however that if any Officer to whom such leave shall be granted shall be absent from his Station for any period exceeding that to which under the last rule he may be entitled without deduction, the Absentee if a Civil Servant shall for the period in excess draw no more than one-half of his Salary and Allowances, and if a Military Officer only so much of the Salary and Allowances of any Civil Office to which he may stand appointed as added to the Military Pay and Allowances which he may be entitled to draw shall equal one-half of his entire Military and Civil emoluments. After an absence of three months (exclusive of any period which may be granted under Sec. XI.) any Office held by the Absentee shall become vacant.

Sec. XIII. is rescinded.

Sec. XVIII. (Amended.) The sum of Company's Rupees 52,200 per annum, having been fixed under the orders of the Court of Directors as the Maximum Salary of Civil Office for the Offices of Government under the situation of Member of Council—Civil and Military Servants holding Office in the Political Department, who may draw larger Allowances than this annual sum as a consolidated personal and sumptuary allowance in consideration of the necessary expences of their position, will in all cases of absence be treated in respect to deductions as drawing only the Allowance thus limited, and the excess above the monthly salary yielded by that annual sum, shall remain as a local addition to the usual Deputation Allowance to be drawn by the Officer performing the duties to meet the necessary expences of his position.

Note.—This rule will equally apply in case of a Political Resident taking a leave of one month for which in other cases he would suffer no deduction.—The excess above the maximum monthly salary will in that case be enjoyed by the person in charge.

Section XIX. (Amended.) Deputation Allowances shall be granted to Civil Servants temporarily performing the duties of an Office according to the following rates, and subject to the limitations and conditions hereinafter laid down.

Note.—Military persons acting for other Military persons holding Civil Offices, will, as at the rate of staff, draw half the difference between the incumbent's Military Allowances and the consolidated Civil Salary as at present, that is, will draw the amount retrenched from the Absentee, but when acting for a Civil Servant they will draw at the rates and under the same rules as Civil Servants.

To Civil Servants not holding any substantive Appointment.

At the rate of 25 per Cent. on the Monthly Salary of the appointment officiated in, such Deputation Allowance being in addition to the Subsistence Allowance of their respective ranks.

To Civil Servants holding an Office of inferior emolument when Officiating for a Superior.

At the rate of 10 per Cent. upon the monthly Salary of the appointment officiated in, in all cases in which the Salary of such appointment shall not exceed Co.'s Rs. 2,000 per mensem, and in respect to all appointments of which the Salary shall be more than Co.'s Rs. 2,000 per mensem, at the rate of 10 per Cent. upon Co.'s Rs. 2,000, and of 5 per Cent. on the amount in which the monthly Salary may exceed Co.'s Rs. 2,000; provided however that no lower rate of Deputation Allowance shall be given than 100 Rs. per mensem.

The Deputation Allowance shall in all cases be in addition to the Salary of the substantive appointment held by the Officer on deputation.

A Civil Servant acting for another shall have no claim to Commission or Fees, where any such sources of emolument exist. These shall be regarded as forming part of the income of the Officer to be relieved, subject to the prescribed deduction.

Sec. XXI. (Amended.) No Subordinate Officer acting for his Principal or for any other person holding a superior appointment in the same Office or Establishment, at the same Station, shall be entitled to any Deputation Allowance until after the expiration of one month, and then the Allowance is not to be drawn in arrear. But a Servant previously out of employment, or who may be deputed to act from a different Station, shall be entitled to Deputation Allowance from the date at which he may enter upon the discharge of the duties to which he has been temporarily appointed.

Sec. XXII. (Amended.) Civil Servants, if deputed to act at a distance from the stations where they are employed, or Military Officers holding Civil Office who may be so deputed, or who may be ordered by Government on Special duty, shall be permitted to draw travelling allowance at the rate sanctioned in the case of a first appointment.

Sec. XXIV. (Amended.) The Government of each Presidency may grant to Chaplains and Assistant Chaplains special leave of absence on private affairs, but if such absence shall exceed the period to which the Absentees may be entitled under the following Rule, they shall for the period in excess be subjected to the deduction of one-half of their Allowances, and after an absence of four months all Allowances shall be discontinued.

Sec. XXV. (Amended.) Leave of absence for one month in each year, under the principle sanctioned in Sec. XI. may be granted to Chaplains or Assistant Chaplains by the Bishop of the Diocese, or when the Diocese may be vacant (but not otherwise) by the Archdeacon or other Ecclesiastical functionary performing the duties of an Archdeacon or Commissary; and such leave being consistent with the rule will be recognized by the Civil Auditor after it has been published in the Government Gazette of the Presidency with the authority of Government. Information of every leave so granted by the Bishop or other Ecclesiastical Officer above mentioned, shall be immediately transmitted to the proper Secretary to Government for the purpose of Notification in the Gazette.

Section XXVI. is rescinded.

Section XXVIII. (Amended.) The Mint Master, the Assay Master and Deputy or Assistant Assay Master of any Mint in India may obtain leave of absence under Sick Certificate, or on private affairs, subject to the conditions in the Rules forming Chapters I. to V. The Absentee if in the enjoyment of any Military pay or allowance shall, during his absence, be subject to the deductions prescribed in the case of Military Officers holding Civil employments. If not a Military Officer the Absentee shall be subject to the same deductions as a Civil servant under similar circumstances, but no Officer of the Mint or Assay Department can be permitted to draw any portion of Salary for a longer period than two years, if absent under Sick Certificate, nor for a longer period than four months if absent on private affairs.

The Rules published on the 29th of January 1840, not affected by the above alterations, remain in force.

Published by order of the Honourable the President of the Council of India in Council.

J. A. DORIN, Secy. to the Govt. of India.

Protector's Office,
Port Louis, March 31, 1843.

SIR,—Since I wrote to you by the Oxford on the 11th instant, the Gilbert Henderson and the Frank Barry have arrived, and I regret to say that an irregularity, which may be productive of very serious consequences to the Captain, has been discovered in the former ship.

At the inspection of the immigrants by the Gilbert Henderson I found that thirteen men and one woman, a list of whose names is enclosed, were not borne on the counterpart list signed by you, but each of them was provided with Mr. Fraser's certificate. The Captain being requested by me to explain the cause of this omission, he stated that when you signed the counterpart list for 1[illegible] immigrants before the ship cleared out, he believed that number to be on board in accordance with his license and with the certificate. On proceeding a certain distance down the river he mustered the emigrants, and [illegible] were missing.

An immediate communication of this was made by the Captain to the [illegible] of Agency at Calcutta, and the 13 men and a woman, already alluded to, were sent on board, most probably without your knowledge, and assuredly without your sanction on the list, [illegible] names were presented to me in a se[illegible] signed by the Captain only. [illegible] of the 13 deserters were obliterated [illegible] mark in the regular counterpart list.

All these circumstances having been reported by me to the Governor of this Colony. His Excellency has been pleased to direct the Captain of the Gilbert Henderson to be prosecuted for a breach of Clause 10 of the Indian Act No. 15 of 1842, and Clause 4 of the Local Act, No. 11 of 1842.

I have the satisfaction to state that the immigrants continue to arrive in excellent condition, and amongst the eleven ships already here only ten deaths occurred on the passage.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your very obedient servant,
C. ANDERSON, Acting Protector.

The Emigration Agent Calcutta.

We think the Mauritius Government has done well in taking up this violation of the law, even though it may see reason to relax the penalties, which if inflicted to the highest figure would amount to Rs. 7000!—Cal. Star, May 19.

A SORT OF INTRODUCTION.

On the 2[illegible]th ultimo, in conformity with the notice which we had previously given, we closed the publication of the United Service Gazette, upon which occasion we announced to our numerous subscribers our intention, on this day, of introducing a weekly paper of certain size and dimensions; at the same time giving an outline of the policy which its pages would advocate: we now redeem the pledge and present to our readers the first number of the World; not that we have the least idea of beginning our campaigns afresh, in the field of Editorial generalship, in as much as that we merely transfer our talent and services from one paper to another; concentrating our forces so as to bring into existence, and maintain in healthy uniformity, a world emanating with renewed and more robust energy and power from the [illegible] ashes of its [illegible]. Our infant world has [illegible] contemporary of the daily [illegible] press, in the exuberance of that [illegible], which its pages so conspicuously portray, was pleased to announce to its readers that our labours had become defunct, no doubt from the sinister and narrow minded idea, that such an announcement from a paper of so contracted a circulation as the [illegible] Gazette, would tend to seduce the more unwary of our subscribers to the meagre columns of its own; but we are proud to say that those Gentlemen who have honoured us with their support, are possessed of too much good sense to be led away by so paltry and specious a stratagem as that to which we allude. We can assure our disappointed contemporary, (and we do it without any disposition to boasting) that our long and increased list of subscribers has flattered us with the assurance, that they will rally round that constitution, whose genial and fostering care, has raised our country and its dependencies to the pinnacle of glory and prosperity which it now enjoys, and thus convince the World, that its resources will gradually increase in proportion as it maintains its consistency.—The World.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.

Times Office, May 13, 6 P. M.

The H. C. Steamer Cleopatra, Lieut. H. C. Boulderson, Commanding, came into harbour this evening at 5 o'clock, bringing with her the London Mail of the 6th April, and the following passengers:—

F. Broughton, Esq., J. Schulhof, Esq., Mr. Brakenbury, Mr. Guillarmod, Mrs. Stevens, 2 Misses Stuart, Mr. Reviere, Mr. Andrews, Mr. Cockburn, Captain Davies, Mr. Gray, Mr. Twemlow, J. S. Law, Esq. Lieutenant Lovell, Mrs. Wilson, Mr. Cochrane, Mrs. Davenport, Mrs. James, Miss Brown, Miss Hudson, Count and Mdme. Relli Menton, Mrs. Major Reed, Captain and Mrs. Lawrence, Mrs. Christie, Mr. Keunde, 2d class, Francis Menzies do., Mr. Davidson, do., Mr. and Mrs. Wright, do., Mr. Davis, do., Mr. White, do.

The Cleopatra left Suez on the 25th ult., arrived at Aden on the 4th and left on the 5th inst. She parted company with the Steamer [illegible] on the 20th April, which vessel had not arrived at Aden up to the time the Cleopatra left.—Bombay Times Extra.

LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S OFFICE, MARCH 21.

Notice is hereby given, that [illegible] Highness Prince Albert will, [illegible] her Majesty, hold Levees, at [illegible] Palace, [illegible] her Majesty, on Wednesday the 2[illegible] instant; and on Wednesday the 2[illegible] of April next; [illegible] at two o'clock.

It is her Majesty's pleasure that presentations to his Royal Highness at these Levees shall be considered equivalent to presentations to the Queen.

Addresses to the Queen may either be forwarded to her Majesty through the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or may be reserved until her Majesty shall hold a Levee.

The contemplated matrimonial alliance between His Highness the Hereditary Grand Duke Frederick of Mecklenburg Strelitz and the Princess Augusta of Cambridge is not expected to be solemnized until the middle of May.

The marriage of the Prince of Saxe Coburg Gotha with the Princess Clementine of France will be solemnised on the 20th of April. The Prince and Princess propose to pass the summer at Coburg, and the winter at Paris.

His Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Wurtemberg has arrived in this country.

The Earl and Countess of Jersey have received the gratifying intelligence of the accouchement of the lovely young Princess Nicholas Esterhazy. Her Highness was confined on the 21st March, of a son and heir, and, when the accounts left Vienna, both the Princess and infant were doing quite well.

A report is current in distinguished circles that Miss Coutts Burdett is at length about to bestow her hand in marriage, and that Lord W[illegible], the eldest son of the Marquis of Winchester, is mentioned as the favoured suitor. Lord Charles Wellesley will, it is said, shortly lead to the altar Lady Mary [illegible], the accomplished daughter of the Marquis of Salisbury.

The subscription for the Collegiate Institution of Liverpool already amounts to 23,[illegible]l.; and it is expected that 8,000l. more will be obtained in 5[illegible] subscriptions throughout England, to be called the M'Neile Testimonial for the Endowment of Scholarships at Oxford and Cambridge, and for nominations for the different schools.—Mr. John Dillon, formerly an officer in the Coast-Guard service, has been held to bail for writing threatening letters to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and an insane person named James Stevenson, a native of Scotland, has been brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with using threatening language respecting her Majesty and Sir R. Peel.

ANOTHER GREAT FIRE IN LIVERPOOL.—We are sorry to say that another dreadful fire took place early on Tuesday morning, by which the boiler-workshops and a great part of the foundry of Messrs. Fawcett and Preston, in York-street, and two warehouses (one bonded and the other free) were destroyed. The fire broke out at one o'clock in the paint-room belonging to the foundry, and though Mr. Whitty and the fire police were immediately on the spot, it was impossible to do anything effectual for a long time, owing to the usual deplorable want of water. At last a supply was procured, but not until the flames had got such a head as to render it impossible to extinguish them, until they had destroyed the greater part of the foundry and an adjoining warehouse, together with another on the opposite side of Lydia Ann-street. We believe that no lives are lost. The loss is very great, and much of it cannot be estimated in money. One of the most painful circumstances connected with this sad calamity is, that it will deprive from [illegible] to [illegible] workmen of employment, and thus add to the already frightful amount of distress existing in the town. Owing to the pressure of the times, the number of men employed in this great establishment had been reduced from nearly 7[illegible] to [illegible], and of these a very large proportion, if not the whole, will be unable to obtain employment until the workshops are rebuilt. Beyond all doubt the fire might have been extinguished with great ease shortly after it commenced, had [illegible] been done, if it had been [illegible] even a moderate supply of water, but not a drop could be procured when that brought in the water-carts attached to the engines was consumed.—The trial of M'Naughten for the murder of Mr. Drummond closed in the Central Criminal Court at a late hour on the 4th March; [illegible] Justice Tindal, with the concurrence of Justices Williams and Coleridge, having stopped the case for the defence, and recommended the jury to acquit the prisoner on the ground of insanity; a verdict which was returned accordingly.

FROM 23RD TO 18TH MARCH.—The Bishop of London has received 5,000l. from a [illegible] donor, to be expended in building a church in London, as an offering to Almighty God for His [illegible] and the good of his church.—Th[illegible] [illegible] been [illegible].—The loss caused by the late fire at Liverpool [illegible] much underrated [illegible] instead of amounting to [illegible] 70,000l., it will [illegible]. Of this aggregate loss, Messrs. Fawcett & Co's. forms an item of not less than 1[illegible]l.

The Times says—As a paragraph has been going the round of the papers announcing the intended resignation of the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer (Lord Abinger), we have been requested to give such reports the most unqualified contradiction, as his lordship neither does now nor ever has contemplated resigning.—In the Prerogative Court, Sir H. J. Fust has decided against the validity of the codicils of the late Marquis of Hertford's will, bequeathing his house in the Regent's Park, the pictures, and some stocks, to the Countess de Zichy Ferraris; and [illegible] dollars, in United States Bank stock, to Mr. Wilson Croker.

The ceremony of throwing open the Thames Tunnel for foot passengers took place on the 25th. The grand rendezvous was the Rotherhithe shaft on the Surrey side of the river, where two marquees had been erected, one for the accommodation of the directors and proprietors with their friends, and the other for the reception of visitors. At 4 o'clock the sound of a gun announced that the ceremony had begun; and the procession started from the greater marquee down the staircase in the following order:—First came a very effective band, belonging, we believe, to the Fusilier Guards, headed by a policeman wearing a Waterloo medal, who seemed highly delighted because they played "See the conquering hero comes." Then followed the standard-bearer, and persons carrying various flags and banners, the clerk, the solicitor, the acting engineer, the surveyor, the chief engineer, the chairman of the board of directors, the directors, the treasurer, the auditors, the proprietors, and, lastly, the visitors, an immense number of persons, including ladies. The route taken was along the western archway of the tunnel, and on arriving at the shaft at Wapping, that was ascended and paraded, and then the procession returned by the eastern archway to Rotherhithe.

IRELAND.—It is announced that the Queen has fixed the month of August for the royal visit to Ireland.

It is generally believed that early in the month, should the weather prove favourable, the Lord Lieutenant, accompanied by the Countess De Grey, will proceed on a tour of visits to the south of Ireland, honouring the mansions of several of the nobility and gentry by their presence in the course of their progress. It is said that advantage will be taken of their Excellencies' absence to effect extensive alterations in Dublin Castle, in anticipation of the expected Royal visit to Ireland. Preparations are being made at the seat of the Earl of Donoughmore, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Tipperary, for the reception of the vice-regal party.

A return has been made to Parliament of the number of gallons of spirits which have been taken out for home consumption in Ireland, during the years 1841-2-3, in order to show the falling off that has taken place in consequence of the labours of Father Mathew. In 1841, the total number of gallons was 7,401,051; in 1842, 6,494,443; and in 1843, 5,290,650; showing a decrease, in three years, of 2,110,401 gallons, and a decrease in the Excise duties on Irish spirits of 243,213*l*.—Mr. Dickey, the Presbyterian clergyman who was shot in his pulpit, is gradually recovering from the effects of his wounds, and the Rev. Mr. Carey, a degraded Presbyterian clergyman, has been arrested on suspicion of being the individual who fired at Mr. Dickey.

The Marquis of Breadalbane has been elected Lord Rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen. Of the four nations, viz. Mar, Angus, Moray, and Buchan, the Marquis had a majority of votes in the first three. We understand that the election turned upon the Church question, and that the enmity to non-intrusion principles of those who were opposed to the noble Marquis was sufficiently bitter. The other nominees were Sir J. Macgregor, Lord March, and the Marquis of Waterford.

Great preparations are making in Scotland for the new secession of Non-intrusionists from the Established Church. Members of the body are perambulating the country, giving lectures and canvassing for support for the "Free Presbyterian Church." The project, in which Dr. Chalmers takes the lead and an active part, is to create a general fund by subscriptions, which is to be distributed in allowances for the support of the several churches and their ministers; an arrangement intended to protect the poorer congregations from the hostility of the upper classes. Dr. Chalmers announced at a lecture in Glasgow, that in his capacity of Convener of the Financial Committee, he should, at the first General Assembly, support the equal distribution of the funds. He mentioned sacrifices which people have already made—

The minister of the High Church in Edinburgh, occupying at present a house of 75*l*. per annum, forsakes it and goes to one of 35*l*. per annum; and while the minister makes this descent, the congregation are endeavouring to raise a sum sufficient to support ten country congregations at 200*l*. per annum each. A lady who has an annuity of 270*l* a-year intends to give up house, and board with one of the ejected ministers, in order that he may derive the benefit of her income. Two ladies of noble family also intend to give up their mansions and to board in Edinburgh, in order that they may have the more means to support the Free Presbyterian Church.

The number of ministers now adhering to the resolutions of the Convocation are—to the first series, 520; to the second, 474.

In the event of the threatened secession taking place in the establishment, a question is likely to be raised as to the appropriation of those chapels of ease which were erected by private subscription. By the constitution granted by the General Assembly to each, it was stipulated that they should be in connexion with the "Established Church of Scotland;" but that constitution now falls to the ground, inasmuch as it was derived from an illegally constituted body—viz., the General Assembly, partly composed of quoad sacra ministers. Hence the original erectors of these chapels maintain that the right of unqualified management has again reverted to them, as proprietors; and that they may give or withhold from the seceding clergymen, according as a majority of the proprietors may determine. Of course, this state of things will only apply to such chapels of ease as received constitutions subsequent to the admission of quoad sacra ministers, as constituent members of church courts.

We regret to announce the death of Dr. Southey, on the 21st of March last, at Keswick. For the last three years he had been in a state of mental darkness, and a twelvemonth ago he was not able to recognise those who had been his companions from his youth. Excess of mental labour in every department of literature—poetry, history, biography, criticism, and philosophy, continued from year to year, without cessation—bowed his strong spirit at last, and obscured the genius which had so long cast a glory upon the literature of the age. In early life, when his powerful and brilliant imagination was trying its wing for the daring flights that it afterwards took, he formed the most exalted notions of the perfectibility of man, indulged in the most generous aspirations for the welfare and improvement of the human race, and seriously thought, with other kindred spirits, of founding a colony in the backwoods of America, where guilt and sorrow should be unknown, and perfect equality, freedom, and happiness should reign for ever. A better knowledge of the world soon dissipated these Utopian reveries; but his ardent imagination, that could confine itself to no middle course, went to the other extreme, and Robert Southey soon became as violent in his Toryism as he had been in his Liberalism.

As a poet, with an exuberance of imagination seldom equalled, and a mastery of versification never surpassed; and as a prose writer, at once elegant and forcible, his name will endure as long as the language in which he wrote. The "wild and wondrous tale" of "Thalaba," and the almost equally wondrous "Curse of Kehama," are the poetical pieces on which his fame will principally rest. As a prose writer he was perfect model of style—easy but not feeble—stately but not cumbrous, and learned but not pedantic. Besides innumerable articles in the Quarterly Review, to which he was a principal contributor, we believe, for nearly thirty years, his chief prose works are, a "Life of Nelson," "The Book of the Church," "A History of the Peninsular War," "Letters from Spain and Portugal," "Essays on the Progress and Prospects of Society," "A History of Brazil," "Lives of the British Admirals," &c. He also wrote biographies of Kirk White and Chatterton, and edited their works, besides editing collections, both of the principal and minor English poets.

He was appointed poet-laureate in 1812. He was twice married—first in very early life, and again but a few years before the mournful overclouding of his intellect to Miss Caroline Bowles.

In all the relations of life Dr. Southey was universally allowed, by those who knew him best, to be truly exemplary. By his own family he was adored; and we have always understood that the burden of maintaining the family of a man of genius, whose irregular habits ill qualified him for the discharge of the ordinary duties of life, chiefly devolved on Dr. Southey.

Dr. Southey has left personal property amounting to about 12,000*l*. By his will, he has bequeathed to his wife all the personal property possessed by her previously to their marriage, together with the interest of the sum of 2,000*l*. during her life. The residue of his property, including the above 2,000*l*. he has bequeathed to his four children, Charles Cuthbert Southey, Edith Mary Warter, Bertha Hill, and Katharine Southey, equally.

William Brooke O'Shaughnessy, Esq. M.D., Asst.-Surg., Bengal Establishment, has been admitted a Fellow of the Royal Society.

A number of water colour drawings of remarkable characters among the princes and people of India, made by the Hon. Miss E. Eden, are exhibited by Messrs. Dickenson of Bond-st.; who are about to publish a selection from them. The collection is highly curious and attractive; conveying lively ideas of the physiognomies and costumes of the various tribes inhabiting our Indian empire; including persons of all ranks, from the Rajah down to the Fakeer. Miss Eden exhibits, extraordinary talent in portraiture; her sketches are not less admirable for painter like feeling and fine taste in colour, than for the felicity with which traits of individual character are depicted. The portraits of Dost Mahommed and his family, Runjeet Singh, Shere Sing, and other persons of distinction, are so expressive and animated as to carry conviction of the truth of the resemblances. Not only the looks but the attitudes are characteristic: for instance, "the old Lion of Lahore" is represented seated in his chair with one leg up, the foot of which is bare, it being a habit of his to kick off one slipper: and Shere Sing sits as cross-legged as a man can do on a chair resting his feet on a foot-stool. The variety and sumptuous richness of the costumes are quite extraordinary: strange and fantastic as are some of the dresses, they are all picturesque, and many of them elegant: the wildest and most ferocious ruffians, and even the Fakeers themselves, present a striking appearance, owing to the style of their dress; a Zemindar or farmer is clad in embroidered silks of different colours, and might pass for a prince. The contrast between the rich and flowing draperies of the natives, and the stiff close-fitting dress of Europeans, is most conspicuous in the sketch of the Durbar of the Governor-General: in which the native attendants make a better figure than the highest English officials. The gay hues of the housings of the elephants, camels, and horses, add greatly to the imposing grandeur of the riders: the bridles and trappings of Runjeet Singh's horse are studded with emeralds of extraordinary size; ropes of these precious stones encircle the horse's neck, and one of the largest known, ornaments the pommel of the saddle: the value of the horse and its equipments is estimated at 350,000*l*.! Miss Eden was permitted by Runjeet to make a sketch of the famous diamond called "the Mountain of Light," the largest in the world; and an enormous piece of pure carbon it is, almost as big as an egg. The sketches to be published will be lithographed in the tinted manner, by Mr. L. Dickenson.

THE COMET.—It has been discovered that "an enormous comet," as Sir J. Herschell calls it, in a letter to the Times, dated Collingwood, March 19th, has been passing through our system.

"Its tail," says Sir John, "for such I cannot doubt it to be, was conspicuously visible, both last night and the night before, as a vivid luminous streak, commencing close beneath the stars Columba and Lambda Leporis, and thence stretching obliquely westwards and downwards, between Lambda and Delta Eridani, till lost in the vapours of the horizon. The direction of it, prolonged on a celestial globe, passes precisely through the place of the Sun in the Ecliptic at the present time: a circumstance which appears conclusive as to its cometic nature.

"As the portion of the tail actually visible on Friday evening was fully 30 degrees in length, and the head must have been beneath the horizon, which would add at least 25 degrees to the length, it is evident that, if really a comet, it is one of first-rate magnitude; and if it be not one, it is some phenomenon beyond the Earth's atmosphere, of a nature even yet more remarkable.

"Eight p. m., 19th March.—The tail of the comet, for such it must now assuredly be, is again visible, though much obscured by haze, and holding very nearly the same position."

In another letter to the Times, dated 24th March, Sir J. Herschell says—

"I obtained a very good view of the head of the comet this evening, as near as I could identify the stars in the strong twilight from the roof of my house, near one of the stars of (rho) Eridani. Its appearance was that of a star of about the fifth magnitude, but dim, and having no sharp nucleus. I could only use a very low magnifier, so that the tail appeared to rise at once from the nucleus, without interval or any appearance of division into two streams. It is a much less conspicuous object than might have been expected from so superb a train; but there will be no difficulty whatever in observing it with fixed instruments."

The first person in England by whom the comet was seen, appears to have been Mr. Shorts, of Christ Church, who discovered it on the evening of the 16th. It was observed during the homeward-bound passage of the Tay West India steamer, on the 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 14th, 15th, and 17th March. The nucleus of this comet was seen at Nice, Mauritius, on 16th March, by Mr. Cooper of Sligo.

The paris Univers of the 17th reports the comet as seen on the previous evening: its tail, which proceeded from the constellation Orion, extending over a space of 60 degrees. M. Arago has substantially confirmed this account; he estimates the length of the comet at 41½ to 43 degrees.

This comet, the sudden appearance of which in our hemisphere has excited so much interest, has as suddenly appeared in the western hemisphere. Its tail was observed on the 5th March, and excited as much interest in America as in Europe, and the nucleus was seen about the same time at Dominica, Barbadoes, and Antigua.

The West Indies have suffered from an awful convulsion of nature, having been visited by an earthquake on the 8th Feb., the desolating effects of which will, in some places, continue to be felt for years. Antigua was sorely stricken, and though comparatively few lives appear to have been lost, the destruction of property was very great. The earth heaved and undulated like the waves of the sea; rocks were riven in pieces; houses and buildings of every kind were rocked to and fro like cradles, and men reeled and staggered in the streets and fields as if intoxicated, or standing upon the deck of a rolling vessel. The scene in the town of St. John's baffles all description; houses levelled with the ground, clouds of dust ascending from them and thickening the atmosphere, the crash of falling walls, the smashing of floors and furniture; men, women, and children rushing from the houses screaming and shrieking: and the groans of the dying commingled with the low rumbling noise of the earthquake itself, altogether presented a scene of terror and alarm which language fails to pourtray. There never was a finer crop; the sugar-making season had just commenced, the canes were either cut or about being cut, and prepared for the crushing-mill; but they may now lie and rot, for the mills are dismantled, the steam-engines disabled, and the boiling-houses either levelled with the ground or unfitted for use. Every church and chapel either laid prostrate or so damaged that it is dangerous to approach or enter them, except the Moravian chapel, which was a wooden one. The old fine cathedral, which had stood the brunt of time for 150 years, has had the roof so twisted upon the walls, and is otherwise so injured, that it threatens to fall. The tower, court-house, public arsenal, police office, lunatic asylum, gaol, barracks, custom house, and indeed every public building in the island, except the government house, has sustained serious damage.

At St. Christopher's in the town of Basseterre, the earthquake produced the most disastrous results. Three women were washing clothes in a stream, surrounded on either side by a high ridge of rocks; the rocks were split asunder, and, tumbling down upon them, crushed them almost to pieces. The walls of the church were cracked, and the gaol so shattered that the prisoners had to be removed. The estates in the country had also suffered severely, especially in the north-east, or windward quarter. The loss of property was estimated to be above 100,000*l.* sterling.

At Nevis, the shock was felt at the same minute as in St. Kitt's and St. Thomas's. The force of the shock here seemed to have been expended in a direction from south-west to north-east, and was supposed to have destroyed property to the amount of from 40,000*l.* to 50,000*l.* sterling, but fortunately no lives were lost.

At St. Thomas's, the shock was felt at 10, 30 A. M., and lasted full three minutes. The vibration was not perpendicular, but horizontal, then a perfect calm; all business suspended, and the frightened inhabitants hastened to return thanks to Divine Providence at their respective places of worship for their escape from destruction. The ships at anchor in the harbour felt the shock very plainly, and those who were below at the time came on deck to see what was the cause. A French brig coming to St. Thomas's, off Tortola, felt the shock so severely that they thought the vessel had struck on a rock.

FRANCE.—The earthquake which visited he British colonies has nearly desolated the French West India islands. In Guadaloupe the town of Pointe-a-Pitre is entirely destroyed, and what was spared by the earthquake has since perished by fire, which burst out a few minutes after the houses fell. The towns of Moule, St. Frances, St. Anne, Port Louis, Bertrand, and St. Rose, have been overturned, and the number of persons who perished at Guadaloupe has been ascertained to amount to between 5,000 and 6,000. The injury done at Martinique was comparatively trifling. The Moniteur officially confirms the report that Admiral Dupetit-Thouars had taken possession of Otaheite and the surrounding group of islands, in the name of the French king. We may possibly soon hear of the Sandwich Islands having also acknowledged the supremacy of France, for the Quotidienne mentions the arrival at Paris of an Envoy from them, of the name of Thomas Haalilio, on the subject of reparations required of his royal master, by the commander of the French ship of war L'Embuscade. The Commerce announces, that orders had been given to the engineers charged with the direction of the works of the fortifications of Paris, to redouble activity in forwarding the construction of the 15 detached forts. M. Guizot's majorities appear to be on the increase; the Secret Service Money bill was carried by 135 to 37.

We are authorised to state that the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company's vessel Bentinck, will not be detained in consequence of the fire which occurred on the premises of Messrs. Fawcett and Preston, at Liverpool, where her machinery was being prepared, but that she will leave Southampton for India, as originally intended, on the 24th Aug. next.

His Excellency Sir C. T. Metcalfe, Bart. and suite left Liverpool in the steam-ship Columbia, for Boston, en route to Kingston, Canada on 4th March.

The Somnath despatch, to which we alluded in our last, though a sensible and very moderate document, has been returned from the Board of Control so mutilated that the Court of Directors have refused to adopt it in its present form, and remitted it to Cannon Row with a very firm but temperate remonstrance on the subject. As neither party are likely to give way, Lord Ellenborough may possibly be altogether spared the mortification of this unpleasant despatch.

Petitions have been presented to both Houses of Parliament from the Hull auxiliary branch to the London Missionary Society, calling upon the legislature to take measures to counteract the hurtful tendency of Lord Ellenborough's idolatrous proclamation respecting the gates of Somnath on the cause of missions and of Christianity in general.

The Observateur de Boulogne contains a letter from Montreuil-sur-Mer, asserting why assistance was not rendered to the Conqueror when she struck, by the boatmen of the coast, arose from the fact of their being prohibited from putting their boats to sea by the Custom-house officers, who, drawn up in a line on the beach, threatened to fire on any one who attempted to disobey their orders. When this cruel interference took place the tide was out, and there would have been comparatively little difficulty in reaching the shipwrecked vessel. The letter adds, that it is of importance to know why such an order should have been given to the Custom-house officers, as, but for the obstruction offered by them, the number of the saved might have exceeded that when the Reliance was lost.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE. 4TH TO 6TH APRIL.—Intelligence from India to 1st March reached London, by telegraph through France, in anticipation of the regular Mail, on the afternoon of the 4th inst. The detailed accounts of Sir C. Napier's engagement are looked for with much anxiety.

It is understood that Lord Ellenborough's policy with respect to Scinde, will immediately be made a subject of Parliamentary discussion.

The Queen continues in excellent health; her Majesty's confinement will probably take place in about a week.

The King of Hanover is expected to arrive on a visit to this country in the middle of May; orders having been received to prepare his apartments in the Ambassadors' Court for his reception by that period. The king is expected to remain six weeks in town. The government of the kingdom during his Majesty's absence will be delegated to the Council of State, of which Major-Gen. Prince Barnard of Solms Braunfels is president.

The long expected "Journal of Events in Affghanistan," kept by Lady Sale, has at length arrived, and has been intrusted for publication to Mr. Murray of Albemarle-street.

It has been settled that the Pacha is to take under his immediate management the transit of passengers and goods through Egypt, for which purpose he has purchased Messrs. Hill & Co.'s entire interest, boats, carriages, horses, &c. for 12,000*l.*; allowing them for the next three years 20*s.* a-head on every first class passenger, and 10*s* a-head for all children and servants using the desert stations. Messrs. Waghorn and Co's business in London and Egypt will go on as usual.

There is little doubt that Mr. Ellis's mission to Rio has failed, his proposal for a fresh treaty having been rejected by the Brazilian ministers, the terms not being such as they are willing to accept; but they have offered to treat if the English Government will reduce the duties on Brazilian sugar and coffee to the same rates as those on sugar and coffee the produce of the British colonies.

We understand that the arrangement of the cabins on board the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company's ship Bentinck at present fitting out at Liverpool for India, will be an improvement on those of the Hindostan, in so far as the space, which on board the latter vessel is made to accommodate one hundred and thirty passengers, will in the former be fitted up for under one hundred; the room so gained being added to the size of the cabins.

We see by the Washington papers, that Congress has passed an Act, appropriating 40,000 dollars to defray the expense of an embassy to Pekin, for the purpose of making a commercial treaty; and Mr. Nathan Dunn, the wealthy merchant, and very talented proprietor of the interesting "Chinese Collection," is proposed as the most suitable person to receive the important appointment, from his long residence of eleven years in Canton, his thorough knowledge of the Chinese character, and of the trade of that immense empire, as well as for his high integrity and moral worth. It is well known that Mr. Dunn scrupulously refrained from participating in the opium trade. Other accounts state, that Mr. Everett is appointed to proceed on a mission from America to the Celestial empire.

From the papers laid before Parliament we collect, that though twelve millions of dollars, or 3,000,000*l.* was demanded and received from the Chinese, on account of the captured opium, the British government, who agree to pay compensation, are willing to appropriate for that purpose only 2,000,000*l.* or less than one-half what the merchants paid for the same property, when purchasing it from the Indian government. That is to say, they will pay 40*l.* a chest for property which, freight and charges included, cost 96*l.* when delivered up, and which, one month after the surrender, was worth, according to the official statement of the Superintendent of Trade to the Foreign Office, at the lowest figure, 120*l.* per chest. It would appear that the Treasury have taken as the scale for compensation the damages given in the supreme Court at Calcutta, in the case of De Souza—namely, 40*l.* per chest. This was a proper verdict; for in that case the constituent had commanded a forced sale, and therefore could have no more than the worth of his goods; and the Court gave him the highest value which the opium scrip bore at the time in the money market; but it is obviously absurd to make the result of a forced sale of 65 chests the basis upon which to go in estimating the value of 20,283 chests.

On the 4th Lord Ashley proposed in the House of Commons the abolition of the opium monopoly, but did not go so far as to propose that the cultivation of the poppy should be prohibited in the British provinces of India, though his own opinion was that such a prohibition would be most beneficial. The motion was seconded by Mr. Brotherton, and supported by Sir G. Staunton, Capt. Layard, Lord Sandon, and Sir R. Inglis; and opposed by Mr. B. Baring, Lord Jocelyn, Mr. Hogg, Mr. Lindsay, and Mr. Acland. Sir R. Peel suggested it to the House to consider whether, if negociations were then pending between England and China for the adjustment of this difficult and delicate question, a resolution of the House affirming an absolute opinion against the continuance of the trade might not defeat that treaty? The monopoly had been attacked; but the highest authorities were in its favour: for instance, those of Lord Cornwallis, Mr. Mill, and others, who had enjoyed opportunities of knowing the subject locally and accurately. He was not asking the House to decide that night between monopoly and free trade in opium; but he did ask them to vote for the previous question, that they might avoid deciding hastily upon a matter requiring the fullest information and the maturest deliberation. He entreated the House to consider the deficient state of the Indian revenue, and the hard pressure of taxation upon the Indian people, which, if the revenue were renounced, must be yet further increased.—Lord Ashley said, that after the declaration of Sir R. Peel, respecting the probable inconvenience which the diplomacy of the Crown might sustain from a vote of the House of Commons, he would not press his resolution to a division.

The revenue accounts for the quarter up to 5th April have been published. On all the other branches of revenue, the Post-office expected, there is still a falling off. In the Customs there is a decrease in the quarter of 275,510*l*, as compared with the corresponding quarter of 1842. On the year there is a decrease of 1,076,836. In the Excise the falling off in the quarter is inconsiderable. The decrease in the quarter is 1,788*l.* On the year the decrease is 1,039,093*l.* In the Stamps the decrease in the quarter is 6,361*l*, in the year 146,790*l.* In the Taxes, in the quarter, 8,055*l.*, in the year 146,082*l.* In the Post office there is an increase in the quarter of 2,000*l.*, and in the year of 103,000*l.*

The Property Tax appears in this quarter at 1,885,232*l.*, and if we estimate the year from the quarter, the produce for the year will be upwards of seven and a half millions.

Sir R. Peel calculated its produce at 3,771*l.*, which was much too low an estimate, for there has been a great increase of the national wealth since the abolition of the former tax.

Various conjectures are afloat as to the intentions of Government, now that the Property Tax has turned out so much more productive than was anticipated. Some think that the Assessed Taxes are to be repealed; others think that Sir Robert will add to the rate of the Income Tax, in order to repeal several duties which press severely on industry.

To Correspondents.

We do not exactly see upon what principle A Friend, wishes us to insert a letter about the intended return of Mr. C. M. to India.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DEPUTY MAGISTRATES.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—I recollect having perused in your paper of the 4th instant, an article relative to the appointment of Deputy Magistrates. Can you kindly inform me, when it is likely that this long looked for appointment will take effect?

I trust the Government will not overlook the applications, which are on record since the year 1838, both at the Offices of the Secretary to Government and the Superintendent of Police; some of them accompanied by several strong testimonials of the character and qualification of the applicants, whose services. I have not the least doubt, would be appreciated by the Government, as much as they have been, and are still, by those under whom they are serving.

Yours obediently,

SIR W. MACNAGHTEN.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—I am induced to hope, that if you will reconsider the remarks you have made on the Meeting of the Friends of the late Sir W. Macnaghten, you will be led to view that Meeting as having been strictly a private one.

It is manifest, that there must be some specific difference between a public and a private Meeting.

The mere circumstance that it was held in the Town Hall, will not constitute this difference, for many private Meetings are held there from motives of convenience.

The distinction would seem to lie in the mode in which it is convened, and in the character of the Chairman.

A public Meeting is convened by the Sheriff upon a public requisition, and he takes the Chair virtute officii. A private Meeting is invited by any body of unofficial men who elect their own Chairman.

If this reasoning be correct, the Meeting held by Sir W. Macnaghten's friends, must be considered in every circumstance private.

But, independent of the broad line which may be drawn as above, I am enabled to add that the late Meeting was in its inception and design, strictly intended to be a Meeting of the friends of the deceased for the sole object, as expressed in the invitation to them to assemble,

"Of taking into consideration the best mode of "evincing by some lasting Testimonial, their feelings of respect for his memory."

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully.

W. H. SMOULT,

Calcutta, May 19th, 1843. Hon. Secy.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—May I beg of you, or some of your correspondents, answers to the following questions.

1. "Are Judges or Magistrates empowered to reject English Petitions from Europeans, which merely involve the setting of the Judge right on a subject which his decision, justified the conclusion, that he did not understand, he having passed a judgment that was quite irrevelant to the prayer of the Petition?"

2. "Is the use of the Persian language really prohibited? and is there any punishment to be awarded the functuagy in whose Court the Persian language is still in full force?"

3d. "Does the Session Judge possess Authority to direct the Principal Sudder Ameen, to proceed to give possession of a bigah of land to the Zemindar, where there is no opposition offered, but on the contrary, where the Ryot himself petitions, that the Zemindar may resume his land, the Ryut not desiring to retain possession of the same any longer."

On obtaining answers to these questions, I shall avail myself of assistance in forwarding documents in support of these questions.

Behar, 9th May, 1843. OMEDWAR.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.—To the Editor of the Record.—SIR,—At this momentous period in the history of our Protestant Church, when, if her lay-members do not support her in the integrity of her pure faith and apostolical practice, there can be but little human hope of her maintenance, I think it will not appear to you to savour of presumption, if I state why I, in common with other Churchmen, have withdrawn my subscription to this Society.

1. We consider the followers of Newmanism to be Dissenters from the United Church of England and Ireland as by law established; and chiefly, because Newmanism, in contradiction to the 6th Article of that Church, makes tradition the joint rule of faith with holy Scripture.—(Tract lxxviii., p. 2.) And because it holds that the power of making the body and blood of Christ is vested in the successors of the apostles.—Froude, vol. i. p. 326.

2. We likewise esteem any Church or sect, holding the points of praying for the dead, (Tract., vol. iii., p. 22,) of the intercession of the Virgin Mary, (Tract lxxv. p. 80,) of justification preceding faith, (Newman, p. 21,) and of deeming the mass to be the sacred and most gracious monument of the apostles, (Newman to Faussett, pp. 46, 47,) as an offset of the Church of Rome, and being adherent to "a modified system of Popery," (Bishop Mant,) as in Dissent from the Anglican Church as by law established.

3. We, under a conviction, that the litteræ scriptæ of Newmanism leave no opening for error in our construction of its language in the preceding respects hold that any Society, whose regents do not take pains to inquire whether its missionaries be or be not Dissenters of this class, are the countenancers and favourers of Dissent; or else unfaithful to their trust, as being careless to maintain the doctrines and practices of the Anglican Church, as by law established.

4. We also know, and this from the personal witnessing of a Christian brother, high in the confidence of the Bishop of Calcutta, that the tenets and practices of this new form of Dissent, are taught and commended by the Principal of Bishop's College and his coadjutors.

5. We withdraw, for this reason among others, that we cannot conscientiously continue to support the regents of the Society in upholding an Institution, like Bishop's College, in which tenets and practices have for some time been professed and inculcated, which we hold, in the first place, to be "heretical," inasmuch as they are opposed to holy Scripture, and "schismatical," inasmuch as they regard the doctrines and rites of the Church of England and Ireland as by law established.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

—Record. A CHURCHMAN.

INFLUENCE OF RELIGIOUS SERVICES ON THE DISORDERED MIND.—In the twenty-fourth Annual Report of the West Riding Pauper Lunatic Asylum, just published, and from which we have given some statistical extracts in another page of our present paper, the following interesting paragraph occurs:—"Independently of any religious consolation that may be derived by the patients, the chapel is one of the best schools in which they acquire self-control. The tranquillity and good order, the exercise of the mental faculties required in following the responses, and other parts of the service, has a salutary influence on the minds of the patients, and the best effects are produced, not only on them, but also on the attendants, by the general assembly of the household to begin the day by mutual acknowledgement of the mercy of God, and united supplication for his blessing on all. With all due respect for the light which science has thrown on the nature and treatment of insanity, and with all value for these therapeutic agents which are often indispensible, mental renovation may be said to be more dependent on moral and religious culture than on any other means employed."—Pat.

THE ESTATICA AT YOUGHAL.—Under this head the Cork Examiner treats the public to a letter from a Roman Catholic priest named Foley, addressed to another clergyman of the same persuasion, detailing a series of miracles now in full work at a convent in Youghal, which threaten, if not to eclipse at least to equal, the Alpine wonders witnessed by Lord Shrewsbury. Of course, it was not to be supposed but that many persons were rather incredulous with respect to the alleged miracle of the Munster Addolorata, which, according to Father Foley, "are now shining brighter than ever in Youghal." A few passages from the narrative of this somewhat credulous gentleman may be perused with amusement:—"But among the many wonders I have seen at the castle, this seems not to be the least; it is that this dear virtuous girl, who is a near relation of my own, and who is now so much calumniated, predicted the night before-hand that a certain class of persons would come to visit her on the following morning, and that they would, &c. The five of us who had heard the prediction were much surprised to see it on the next morning verified to the letter. Something similar had happened to the afflicted idolorata of Caldaro, when she said, 'There is now a physician on his way to see me, who will annoy me very much.' These gentlemen whom you have mentioned to me seemed displeased, as they had not witnessed the wonders they wished to see, as if the Almighty should bow to us, and gratify our curiosity by exhibiting things so plainly to our view as not to leave a shadow of doubt upon our minds. They went off, I am told, discontented, and thought themselves authorised to pronounce without scruple that all the work was pure imposition. What will they think when they hear that many witnesses are ready to prove upon oath, that upon that very same day, after these curious persons had gone off, there was blood visibly seen upon this women's head, upon her hands, upon her feet, and upon her side? I know a man can be found who will say, perhaps, she had a nail or a needle with which she could perforate her hands, feet, and side. I leave the judgment of that man to the judgment of an enlightened public, and to the awful judgment of an angry God. To resume, in a word or two, the question is this: Father Foley, though a pious priest, as they say, is one of the greatest dupes that ever stood on ground. He has been selected by the bishop of the diocese to direct a pious community of nuns in Youghal. Many, and very many persons, have always thought him to be an enlightened director of souls, yet with all his science and sanctity he is now the fool of fools, he is credulous beyond conception. For months, nay, for almost years, he has had two persons in his establishment who are practising under his eyes the greatest villanies that were ever practised by a woman, and yet he cannot detect them. The author of such opinions must add too, yes! he is deceived by a woman, a near relative of his own, an always pious girl, whom he saw elevated over ground in prayer, whom he often saw in ecstasy; from whose hands he often saw the blood flowing at the hour of holy communion, and from whose lips he has learned many things regarding the passion of Christ, and the suffering of his blessed mother, things which are not to be told now, but which will be related in their proper time. I have, dear Rev. Sir, written to the Bishop of this diocese, and invited his Lordship to come and see what I have witnessed. I have written to the Court of Rome, and given a fair statement of the estatica of Youghal." The Examiner, after guarding itself from pronouncing any opinion upon this strange affair, states that "the magistrates at Youghal have interfered so far as to send two policemen to the house where the females subject to so extraordinary a visitation are residing, but they were hindered making their domiciliary visit by Mr. R. A. Fitzgerald, justice of the peace, who told them there was nothing in the affair that called for their presence, or would warrant such a proceeding. We may remark (continues the Examiner), in the present stage of this singular affair, that the Catholic clergy of Youghal have not come to a final judgment upon the point whether the appearances on the bodies of the females subjected to such periodical visitations are natural or supernatural, and their caution and reservedness upon a point so important are wise and judicious. We shall call attention in a future post to the whole matter."—Pat.

NEWS FROM AMERICA.—A Dissenting minister in England having a desire to know the opinion of the American Churches relative to the prophecies, proposed a number of questions to a relation of his, a bookseller, and a member of a Christian Church; the following was one: "Are the American writers on prophecy advocates for the literal interpretation of Scripture, or do they reckon a day for a year?" To which he received the following reply, in a letter dated Roxbury, December the 15th, 1842:—"The great champion on this subject is a Mr. Miller; he and his followers preach and believe the total destruction of the world in the year 1843: some of them say in April next." It is estimated that there are from seven hundred to a thousand Ministers, and five hundred thousand to seven hundred and fifty thousand persons, of different denominations, who have declared themselves believers in the destruction of the world next year; and if it does not take place then (1843), then they say the Bible will be proved to be false." This figurative system of interpreting prophetic numbers has led thousands astray in Germany, France, and England, as well as in America, during the last two centuries, among whom we may reckon the following eminent writers: Fox, the martyrologist; Junius, Walter Bute, Dr. H. More, Brigham, Alstedius Mede, Macknight, Parker, Eph. Heut, Hartlib, J. Cotton, Dr. Thomas Goodwin, E. R. Leonorius, W. Alleine, Jos. Hussey, Beverley, P. Jurieu, Mitchell, Whiston, Daubbuz, Bicheno, B. D. Bogie, E. Cooper, Frere, Mann, Sharpe, Etterick, and many others; to whom may be added, W. Cunninghame, Esq., who believed, from his estimate of the prophetic numbers, that the second advent of the Lord would take place before the 3rd of April, 1840. (See his "Scientific Chronology of the year 1839.") The present year will test the calculations of some other highly respectable authors, Mr. Habershon and the Rev. E. Bickersteth; both of whom state, that according to their reckoning of the sacred numbers, the Turkish empire will fall, and the Jews be restored in the year 1843. But none of the above have gone to the awful excess of the Americans. It would be well if the students of prophecy would remember, that though the most important approaching events are plainly revealed, yet the times are wisely concealed. He whose word is not to be disputed, said to his inquisitive disciples, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father has put in his own power."—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LORD ASHLEY AND NATURAL EDUCATION.—We confess a natural reluctance to seek after new terms of praise, when all the common forms of approbation and admiration have been exhausted by the daily press, the writers of which, in the matter of Lord Ashley's Motion of Tuesday, have had more than twenty-four hours' start of us. But we would both express, and call forth, a feeling of thankfulness to Almighty God, for the united qualities of wisdom and prudence, and industry and zeal, which he has bestowed on that young nobleman, and for the growing honour and influence with which He is evidently favouring his efforts. The success of Tuesday evening resembles one of Mr. Wilberforce's triumphs; and being granted to his Lordship at a comparatively early period of his public career, it promises not only good in itself, but also increased power of doing good in other matters

Of his Lordship personally, we think it better to copy a few lines from the leading Whig journal—the Morning Chronicle—than to labour merely to put the same, or less worthy thoughts, into inferior language. Of course one important part of the value of this tribute arises from the fact, that it emanates from a journal which is diametrically opposed to his Lordship on every imaginable question in politics and religion.

"It would be doing an injustice to our own sense of the great merit of Lord Ashley's speech, were we to permit even this occasion to pass without recording our approbation of the admirable spirit which pervaded it. Men of all parties agree that to no single individual do the humble classes of this country owe a deeper debt of gratitude than to Lord Ashley. He is emphatically the advocate of the poor and the helpless; and it is impossible to overrate the services he has conferred upon his suffering fellow-creatures by the deep and persevering earnestness with which he has kept their cause before the public, until he has induced all to participate in his own generous and Christian sympathy. As no man has done more to expose the causes which have been tending so rapidly to brutalise the populations in our manufacturing and mining districts, so no man could have more appropriately suggested the proper remedy for these evils—a general and well-digested system of national education. Nothing could be more gratifying than the temper not only with which the subject was introduced by Lord Ashley, Sir James Graham, and Lord John Russell, but also with which it was received by the House of Commons. The very full attendance of the Opposition was not more creditable to the Liberal party than the approving cheers with which they received Sir James Graham's deprecation of treating it as a party subject."

We must not, however, quit the subject without stating what the immediate fruits of Lord Ashley's Motion are likely to be. The Government, through Sir James Graham, announced its readiness at once to propose two measures, which, though they will not do all that may be desired, will nevertheless greatly tend to diminish the mass of ignorance, vice, and wretchedness, which Lord Ashley so vividly described.

The first is to provide at once for all the children of the pauperized poor. For these, public schools are to be established, apart from any workhouse, in districts of ten or fifteen miles circuit. The second measure is to make the existing laws operative (which they have never yet been) in the matter of the instruction of children employed in factories. Both these Bills are to be introduced without delay; and are to become laws in the present session. Even were this the whole result, the gain would be enormous; but the entire admission of the whole case by the Government, promises a further and a finishing measure on some future occasion. Nothing has occurred, since the accession of Sir Robert Peel to power, so distinctly fraught with promise of great benefit to the nation, as was the debate of Tuesday evening.—Record.

LORD ASHLEY'S SPEECH ON THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS EDUCATION OF THE WORKING CLASSES.—Lord Ashley rose to move, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take into her instant and serious consideration the best means of diffusing the benefits and blessings of a moral and religious education amongst the working classes of her people." In bringing before the House a question of such prodigious moment, involving vast considerations of the highest importance, the person who undertook so weighty a task might well solicit the indulgence of the House. If there was likely to exist any difference of opinion upon the subject, he might perhaps have refrained from undertaking the charge, but late events had sufficiently proved that the moral condition of the working classes in this country was exceedingly unsound, and that, therefore, no time was to be lost, and no effort left unmade, to do something additional for the improvement of their moral and religious welfare. He would not, as a preliminary to his observations, enter into the question of who was responsible for the present deplorable condition of the people; but, seeing the degradation to which they were reduced, it was the duty of that House to examine into the circumstances, and to say whether it was safe as regarded the interests of society, whether it was consistent with morality, or whether it was becoming the dignity of a Christian nation,—whether such a state of things should be permitted to continue; and if not, whether the House ought not to try and apply an immediate remedy to the evil. (Cheers.) He conceived that the present time was highly favourable to the opinion which he was about to propound. The public mind was just now almost equally distinct from the two extremes of opinion to which it had formerly tended with respect to this subject. One of these opinions maintained the doctrine that education would prove a panacea for all the difficuities by which we were surrounded; the other opinion was, that education would do nothing, or rather that it would increase and aggravate the evils. To suppose that education would do everything was highly absurd (hear, hear), but to suppose that it would do nothing was still more so. (Cheers.) In every age, those nations which exhibited sobriety, intelligence, and steadiness amongst the great body of the people enjoyed in proportion external glory and internal happiness. (Hear.) Without multiplying examples, he would quote the opinions of two men, to whose testimony he conceived the House would afford full credit. John Locke said:—"I think I may say that of all the men we meet with, nine parts in ten are what they are, good or evil, useful or not, by their education. It is that which makes the great difference in mankind;" whilst the language of Solomon was, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Had any one shown any other means by which to attain so desirable an end? If, in small states, and under despotic Governments, education was so desirable, it was still more so in largely populated countries enjoying free institutions. (Cheers.) It was our lot to have a vast and increasing population; our institutions were more liberal than those of most other nations, and we should make provisions to meet the growing spirit of democracy which the circumstances of the age tended so strongly to foster. Under these circumstances, the public safety required that year after year fresh efforts should be made to enlighten the public mind, by means of a sound moral and religious education, so as that the working classes might acquire that sober self-control which would enable them to govern and repress the promptings of their passions. (Cheers.) It was only to the Gospel that they could safely look for the lessons and the practice of true morality. (Hear, hear.) For the maintenance of true Christianity it was necessary that it should be co-existent with free institutions in Church and State (hear, hear), and the sense of public and private duty, as well as the cautious self-control which Christianity inculcated, was unknown to the democracies of former times. (Hear, hear.) In making the present Motion he did not mean to deny the meritorious efforts which had been used by the National Society for the furtherance of education; nor would he disparage or detract from the exertions made by the various Dissenting bodies; but, in spite of all that had been done, there still remained open a vast uncultivated moral waste—a terrible wilderness of spiritual devastation. (Cheers.) In 1801 the population of England and Wales was 8,872,980, whilst in 1841 the returns gave 15,906,829, showing an increase of more than 7,000,000 in less than half a century. Taking one-fifth of the present population, which by the way was understating, as the number supposed to be capable of some education, we should have 3,181,365. Deducting one-third from those as persons presumed to be educated at private expense, there would still remain 2,120,910. Making a further deduction for children supposed to be in union houses of 50,000, and also deducting ten per cent. for absence and casualties, which would be 212,091, there would still remain 1,858,819 to be provided for at the public expense. (Hear, hear.) Now, it appeared from tables made out by the Rev. Mr. Burgess, of Chelsea, that the total number of daily scholars in connexion with the Established Church was 749,626, and from the same table it appeared that the total number of daily scholars in connexion with the Dessenting bodies was 95,000. The total number then of daily scholars in England and Wales was 844,626, leaving without any daily instruction 1,014,193 persons capable of some education. Now, if the House would look forward to the next ten years, the probability was that the population in England and Wales would be increased by 2,500,000, and thus an inconceivable multitude would be added to the number of those persons capable of instruction, but receiving none. (Hear, hear.) The number of commitments in 1841, of persons of all ages, was 27,760, and of these eleven and a half per cent. on the whole amount were under sixteen years of age. He did not quote these commitments as showing accurately the moral condition of the country. He felt that such a test would be a very fallacious one, as he could not say whether the commitments were increasing, stationary, or diminishing. If there were a diminution of commitments, it would be difficult to say whether the fact was owing to an increase of moral feeling on the part of the population, or whether it was to be attributed to the activity of the police in the prevention of crime. It would be perilous to rely upon any such test, and he should not, therefore, go into a comparison of the committals of one given year with another. If an increase of crime were shown by these means his case would be more strongly made out, and if no increase were shown it would prove no more than that there was an increase of external morality. He would now take a few of the larger towns, and see the local nature of the evil as well as the extent to which it had reached, so as that the House might be better able to apply some remedy. He had lately seen the Report of the Inspector of Factories, and also that of the Children's Employment Commissioners, and he must here record his sincere and heartfelt thanks for the fidelity and unprecedented zeal with which those gentlemen had addressed themselves to their task. The Noble Lord then drew the attention of the House to the present state of crime and ignorance, and of moral and intellectual degradation, in Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and other populous districts, among the lower classes, especially the younger portion of them. He read from authentic documents an appalling account of the gross ignorance and immorality that pervaded these places. Some of these we may quote as specimens. He read the evidence of an elderly woman, sixty years of age, as it would be desirable the House should know the feelings and opinions of that class of persons:—Charlotte Kirkman, aged sixty, said, "I think morals are getting much worse, which I attribute, in a great measure, to the beer-shops. . . There were no such girls in my time as there are now. When I was four or five and twenty my mother would have knocked me down if I had spoken improperly to her." "The evidence (says the Sub Commissioner), with very few exceptions, attests a melancholy amount of immorality among the children of the working classes in Sheffield, and especially among young persons. Within a year of the time of my visit the town was preserved from an organized scheme to fire and plunder it merely by the information of one man, and the consequent readiness of the troops. A large body of men and boys marched on it in the dead of night, and a very large quantity of crows'-feet, to lame horses, pikes, and combustibles, was found on them, at their houses, and left on the road. Several were pledged to fire their own houses. I name this as a further illustration of the perilous ignorance and vice prevailing among that young class, between boys and full-grown men, who were known to be among the chief actors in these scenes." It was due to that excellent body of men, the clergy of Leeds and its neighbourhood, after rending such a deplorable account of crime, to read a passage from the Report of the Assistant-Commissioner, Mr. Symons, who says, "If vice increases in Sheffield, the blame assuredly rests not on the clergy. Few towns are blessed with so pious or active a ministry. It is not for want of exertion on their parts if the church and chapels are unfilled and the schools scantily attended; and this remark applies also to part of the Wesleyan and some other religious denominations." (Cheers.) He would now call the attention of the House to the state of Wolverhampton as reported by Mr. Horne, one of the Sub-Commissioners. Mr. Horne went on to state,—"Among all the children and young persons I examined, I found, with very few exceptions, that their minds were as stunted as their bodies—their moral feelings stagnant. The children and young persons possessed but little sense of moral duty towards their parents and have little affection for them. You will find boys who have never heard of such a place as London, and of Willenhall (only three miles distant), who have never heard of the name of the Queen, or of such names as Wellington, Nelson, Buonaparte, and King George. But (adds the Commissioner), while of Scripture names I could not in general obtain any rational account, many of the most sacred names never having been heard, there was a general knowledge of the lives of Dick Turpin and Jack Sheppard, not to mention the preposterous epidemic of a hybrid negro song. The master of the British School says, 'I have resided as a teacher for the last six years, during which I have observed that the character and habits of the numerous labouring poor are of the lowest order.' The Master of the National School says, 'besotted to the last degree.' The Report in Willenhall said, 'A lower condition of morals cannot I think, be found.'" After describing at length such instances of irreligion in various other parts of the kingdom, the Noble Lord proceeded to say there was evidence which established the fact that not less than 25.000,000*l.* sterling are annually expended in ardent spirit; and it was proved by medical men that a large proportion—perhaps half—of all the cases of insanity are produced by the intemperance thus widely prevalent. He was aware that what he asked would occasion some expense; but if we would not consent to tax ourselves for the prevention of crime, we must be taxed more heavily still for the punishment of it. The expense of one convict for one year would educate more than 100 children. He attributed much of the existing evil to the truck system, to the payment of wages at public-houses, and to the miserable condition of the people's habitations. The Noble Lord thus concluded the painful review he had been obliged to make. He had not presumed to present to the House any scheme, because he had ever thought that so great and weighty a question demanded all the collective wisdom and deliberation which it was in the power of the Legislature to bring to bear upon it. Our penal code was insufficient to put a stop to crime. Many were dismissed because they could not be punished, and became worse. Punishment itself then lost one-half of its terrors, because it could no longer appeal to any sense of shame. Society had a right, no doubt, to have those miscreants punished who made a trade of crime; but they could never subdue the disciples of such men unless by an influence of another order, and that influence they must draw from the great depository of truth. The criminal tables and statistics furnished no estimate whatever of the extent of crime in the nation. Were it the total amount of crime, however we might lament it, we might almost disregard its consequences. But the injury at present inflicted on the nation by the real amount of crime was far great and more deep, and no one who had heard these statements, and believed them, could hope for any other result, if allowed to continue, than, before twenty years should have elapsed, a general convulsion and dispersion of the whole system of society. He believed that the minds of men just as much as their bodies were liable to be affected by a moral epidemic; and so long as the present state of things was allowed to go on, to no purpose would they labour to restore the finances of the country, to extend its commerce, or to explore the hidden resources of other nations. They would only be groping at noon-day as though it were night, forgetful of the word of God—that there is no strength, nor happiness, nor comfort, nor peace, but in the wise and virtuous habits of the people. Was the condition of the females of the country of no importance? and yet hear the language of an eye-witness, and of one long and intimately conversant with the subject. He says,—"They are becoming similar to the female followers of an army, wearing the garb of women, but actuated by the worst passions of men; in every riot or outbreak in the manufacturing districts the women are the leaders and exciters of the young men to violence. The language they indulge in is of the most horrid description—in short, while they are demoralizing themselves they demoralize all that come within their reach." Attempts might be made to administer consolation by saying, that a mob of Englishmen would never be found disgracing itself by acts of atrocity. But the hundredth part of the reign of terror, one single repetition of the scenes of 1780, which occurred a few years ago at Bristol, or more recently at Nottingham, would suffice to overturn that idea. If we would retrace our steps, and apply ourselves earnestly to the task, there lay before us the prospects of virtue and of peace. Examine all nations, and it would be found that the educated man was the best and safest in every country. (Hear, hear.) Were he to quote the testimony of distinguished naval and military officers, they would be found to agree in saying that no discipline was equal to that of education. They had already heard the opinions of the Judges expressed at the late Commission, and in particular the charge of that eminent lawyer and good man, Chief Justice Tindal. (Hear.) He had read correspondence from clergymen in the disturbed districts, and the effect of it was, that a very few of their congregations, and none belonging to their schools, were found among the insurgents against the peace of the country; for such persons knew that, however grievous their wrongs, they owed obedience to the law, not on a calculation of forces, but for conscience' sake. (Hear, hear.) He could not overlook this great and strong consideration, that the moral condition of England seemed destined by Providence to lead to the moral condition of the world. Year after year they were sending out to various parts of the globe thousands of the inhabitants of this country; and the Anglo-Saxon race would hereafter cover half of the habitable world. Consider, then, what a mighty means of working out the happiness of the inhabitants of the globe would be provided, if these thousands of our countrymen were to carry out with them, and plant in distant regions, our laws, our morality, and our religion. (Hear.) These were the grounds of his appeal to the House; such was the plan he ventured to propose, and the arguments by which he supported it. The country required such a measure, and, though many disappointments and failures might be encountered, it would nevertheless bear an abundant harvest. "We call the working population," continued the Noble Lord, "improvident and immoral, and so they often are; but that improvidence and immorality are the results in a great measure of our neglect, and in not a little of our example. (Hear, hear.) We owe them, too, the debt of kindlier language and more frequent intercourse. This is no fanciful obligation. (Hear, hear.) The people of this country are more alive than any other to an honest zeal for their welfare and sympathy for their condition; and, though that sympathy may often fall on unimpressible hearts, it never fails to find some that it comforts and many that it softens. (Hear, hear.) Only let us now declare that we will enter on a better course; that we will seek their temporal through their eternal interests; and half our task will be accomplished. There are many hearts to be softened—many minds to be instructed—many souls to be saved.—O patria! O Divum domus! If we engage in such a task the blessing of God will rest on our labours, and the oldest among us perhaps may live to rejoice, for himself and children, at the opening dawn of the immortal, because the moral glory of the British empire." (Cheers.)—Record.

STATISTICS OF THE PERIODICAL PRESS IN THE FRENCH CAPITAL.—We extract the following from the Journal Des Débats.—In 1812, Paris reckoned only 45 journals, or periodical writings: in 1826 she had 179; at the commencement of 1830 they amounted to 309: and in the month of August last there were 493. Of these, 35 are daily papers, 95 weekly, 218 monthly; 5 appear once in three months, 8 three times a week, 31 twice, 8 three times a month, 4 six times a week, 2 every second day, 3 every fifth day, and 2 every ten days; 1 every six months, and the rest at irregular intervals. In price, they vary from 120 francs to 2 francs 50 centimes per annum; and as regards their specialty, may, leaving politics out of the question, be classed as follow;—15 are religious publications (six of them Protestant and one Jewish), 29 are devoted to jurisprudence, to medicine 27, natural sciences 14, fashions 22, naval matters 4, theatricals 10, philosophy 4, morals 5, administrative affairs 19, education 28, literature 37, Free-Masonry 1, advertisements 28, agriculture, horticulture, &c., 18: the book trade 10, mathematics 4, industry 4, commerce 33, music 14, &c.—Athenæum.

PARISIAN DIAMONDS.—Those beautiful imitations of the "priceless gem," which have lately attracted so much attention, are made by a chemist in Paris, and are only the oxide of tin. It is to be regretted that the brilliancy which has rendered this imitation so famous cannot be depended upon, as, after exposure for some time, they become as dull as common glass. —Mining Journal.

AMBER.—A discovery is said to have been made, in the neighbourhood of Zehdenik, near Potsdam, on the Havel, of a rich mine of yellow amber, of hardness equal to rock crystal.—Athenæum.

CHODRUC-DUCLOS.—The death of this man, so well known to all frequenters of the Palais Royal, has been announced in the daily papers; but the following, from the Paris Encyclopediana, may amuse:—"Paris has just lost one of its wonders, the Palais Royal one of its ornaments, little children their bug-a-boo, and provincials an object of great curiosity. Chodruc-Duclos is no more. Had he, or had he not, a fortune of 50,000 fr. a-year? I have heard that he had it, and that he kept it concealed in an old stocking. I never believed it; but he who told me so, would have been very sorry to hear it was not true, because it would have made Chodruc-Duclos a much less original character. I respect this opinion: but, in the meantime, will give mine. Chodruc-Duclos, whose origin I know not, was born in Bordeaux, and attracted attention there as a fashionable during the reign of Napoleon. He dined with M. de Martignac, supped with M. de Peyronnet, and fought every one who looked askance at him. The Restoration surprised him in the midst of these agreeable pastimes. He was at the theatre of Bordeaux, in 1814, the night that M. de Martignac caused a wretched vaudeville to be played in honour of Wellington and King George. His friends led the royalist reaction, and he led the malcontents. All were recompensed save Chodruc-Duclos. There is a moment in revolutions, when the lowest citizen can pretend to anything, and become at once the greatest of men. Clever are those who know how to seize the moment, and become colonels, prefects, generals, counsellors of state, &c. Chodruc-Duclos aimed at being a colonel of gendarmes: he was offered the rank of chef d'escadron; he refused; the moment passed, and he was without a place: and, at last, he was offered the appointment of simple gendarme. He again refused, expecting an opportunity which his friends told him was near at hand. Several years thus passed. In 1820 the liberal conspiracy was tried by the Chamber of Peers. M. de Peyronnet, procureur-général at Bourges, was chosen to carry on the accusation. This was a new vista open to M. de Peyronnet and his friends. Chodruc-Duclos hastened to Paris. M. de Peyronnet shewed great zeal in this trial; nevertheless he did not meet with all the success he desired. The Chamber of Peers did not listen to him with great favour. Several lawyers, moral accomplices of the accused, took him up at every word, and sometimes with the approbation of the court. The witnesses themselves parried his attacks; and Colonel Fabvier being called before the court in that quality, gave a severe lesson to De Peyronnet. Chodruc Duclos, who then had a new coat, challenged the Colonel immediately after the sitting of the court; they fought, and the Colonel was slightly wounded. He thought he had again deserved all that he had coveted six years before. I remember seeing him at the Café Valois, surrounded, complimented, and treated by the fanatics of that defunct royalist establishment. But he had no other recompense for his devotion. His friends were too much taken up with themselves to think of him. M. de Peyronnet became Garde des Sceaux a year after the duel. Then the poor maniac, disappointed in his hopes, resolved to fall into misery, in order to shame those who abandoned him. Of all his clothes he kept but a blue coat, which all Paris has seen changing by degrees to violet, thence to rusty grey, and from that to a dirty black. In 1830 he still wore the remains of this coat, which was kept together by means of twine. Since then he has been a little better dressed, but I would not recommend any one to his tailor. Was Chodruc-Duclos possessed of wit? I know not. All I can say is, that his wit had followed his fortune, and that his bons mots were no better than his clothes. He spoke little: the reason of this might have been, that those who gave him alms withdrew as fast as possible from the poor devil who asked them. The Palais-Royal was to him a vast cobweb, of which he knew all the lines, circles, and tangents. He saw from one end of it to the other those he wished to render his tributaries, and he calculated the circuit and the turns he should make in order to fall upon them of a sudden. His word was—'Send me a little money, I want to take a bouillon!' It has already been related, that during the Three Days of July, seeing a man loading his gun, he took it from him, fired at a Swiss guard, and shot him. Then turning to the man, he returned him the gun, saying—'That's the way to make use of the musket; I return it to you, being not precisely a liberal myself;'—or, in the original language,—'Voila là maniere de s'en servir: je vous le rends, parceque ce n'est pas mon opinion.' This anecdote, true or not, depicts well enough the position and character of this well-bred Lazzarone, indifferent to all that then excited the crowd, but still excelling in those feats of arms that had once distinguished him."—Athenæum.

EMBANKMENT OF THE NILE.—"I hasten to transmit to you the details which I have had the opportunity of collecting respecting this important undertaking, which the Viceroy is about to carry into effect. * * 1st. The establishment of a gigantic bridge, of eighty-three arches, to cross the Nile near the head of the Delta, whose point will serve as the spur and central support. Each side of this bridge barrier being perpendicular to the branch of the river whose waters it has to sustain, their junction on the Delta will form an angle of 160 degrees. The Pont-Neuf, in Paris, which crosses the Seine, resting on the point of the island, may convey, on a small scale, an exact idea of the damming of the Nile.—2nd. To the right and left of this spur will be a huge double sluice, for the navigation of the two branches of the river.—3rd. The eighty-three arches of the bridge will be closed by gates, giving the means of raising or lowering the level of the river, according to the several necessities of irrigation or of navigation. They will serve, too, as sluices for clearing out the Nile and the canals situated below the dam.—4th. The head of the spur will be truncated, to allow the passage of an irrigating and navigable canal, whose numerous branches, with their several sluices, will be distributed throughout all parts of the Delta. A swivel bridge, crossing the canal near its source, will occupy the junction-point of the two oblique lines formed by the ensemble of the works.—5th. Above this barrier will be likewise dug on each side of the Nile, a canal for the agricultural wants of the lands lying east and west of the river.—6th. Up stream, the banks of the Nile will be raised by long causeways, which will keep the river at a constant level of eight mètres above low water.—7th. The spur, as well as the corresponding portions of the right and left banks, will be fortified with strong masonry. For all the submarine works, concrete (beton) will be used: and the rest will be built of hewn stones, bricks, and granite. All these materials are found in the neighbourhood. The quarries of Mokatan, whose produce is now so easily got at by means of the railroad established at Tourah, will supply the stone. Gouriès, whose clay soil is situated but a few miles below the point of the Delta, will supply the clay needed for the manufacture of the pouzzolane, which enters into the composition of the concrete. As for lime, it abounds in Egypt. Most persons know that artificial pouzzolane is obtained with these baked bricks pulverized. This pouzzolane, analogous to the volcanic product of that name, needs only mixing with a third of lime, to compose a mortar, whose combination with two parts of pounded granite constitutes concrete. Before the discovery of this Egyptian pouzzolane, which costs five francs per cubic mètre, it had to be brought from Italy, at a cost of about forty-five francs. M. Mougel, engineer to the Viceroy, has already used Egyptian pouzzolane, with great success, in the works constructed by him in the Port of Alexandria. He it is who is the author of this embankment project; the plans and preparatory works for which are all finished. The expense of these works has been estimated at from seven to ten millions of francs. The materials once collected, five thousand workmen will in three years complete this colossal undertaking, which will have the majestic character of the works of ancient Egypt. The country will thus enjoy a regular irrigation, and the navigation of the river be open all the year: great tracts of land, hitherto waste, will be brought into cultivation; and from that day Egypt will no more have to fear years of scarcity, from the lateness or deficiency of her inundation; whilst the current becoming more active in the numerous canals of the Delta and bordering provinces, will promote the increased salubrity of the whole country. One or two auxiliary dams established in Upper Egypt, will hereafter make that province a sharer in these benefits; rendering useless the incredible number of sakias which [illegible] the banks of the river. According to calculation, the system of irrigation now in use in Egypt, though very limited, employs annually 200,000 oxen and 100,000 men.—Dr. Labat, Journal des Débats.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA.

Agra, 2d May, 1843.

In continuation of General Orders of the 4th of October 1842, fixing the Establishment of the Extra or Kelat-i-Ghilzie Regiment of Native Infantry, then brought on the strength of the Bengal Army, the Right Honourable the Governor General of India, for the purpose of removing existing mis-apprehension, is pleased to notify, that with the exception of the Allowances for the Command of Companies, and for the repairs of Arms and Accoutrements, the Pay and Allowances of every description of the Officers and Men of that Corps were intended, and are to be precisely the same as those received by the corresponding ranks in Regiments of the Line.

An Allowance for the repairs of Arms and Accoutrements, at the rate of 25 Rupees a Company, will be drawn by the Commanding Officer of the Regiment.

The Officer holding the situation of 2d in Command, will draw a Consolidated Salary of Rupees 500 per mensem.

The Right Honourable the Governor General has much pleasure in publishing for the information of the Army, the subjoined extract from a Despatch from the Honourable the Court of Directors, No. 5, dated 1st March, 1843:—

"The Court adverting to the collection of papers which was laid before them by the Chairman on the 15th ultimo, relative to the successful termination of the late military operations in Affghanistan, it was on several motions

"Resolved unanimously,—That the thanks of this Court be given to Major General Sir George Pollock, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath; to Major General Sir William Nott, G. C. B.; to Major General Sir John McCaskill, K. C. B.; to Major General Sir Robert Henry Sale, G. C. B.; to Major General Richard England, and the other Officers of the army, both European and native, for the intrepidity, skill, and perseverance, displayed by them in the military operations in Affghanistan, and for their indefatigable zeal and exertions throughout the late campaign.

"Resolved unanimously,—That this Court doth highly approve and acknowledge the valour, and patient perseverance displayed by the Non-Commissioned Officers and Private Soldiers, both European and native, employed in Affghanistan, and that the same be signified to them by the Commanders of the several corps, who are desired to thank them for their gallant behaviour."

Agra, 6th May, 1843.

The Right Honourable the Governor General of India is pleased to appoint Captain John Peter Wade, of the 13th Regiment Native Infantry, to be Fort Adjutant at Allahabad, vice Hickman permitted to resign the situation.

BY THE COMMANDER IN-CHIEF.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 28th April, 1843.

The following orders are confirmed:

The order issued on the 10th instant, by Brigadier F. Young, commanding at Nowgong, directing Surgeon J. Greig, of the 59th regiment of native infantry, to afford medical aid to the 6th company 6th battalion of artillery, and Assistant Surgeon W. W. Wells, of the 74th regiment of native infantry, to receive medical charge of the 8th regiment of light cavalry and detachment of the 8th irregular cavalry, from Surgeon G. G. Brown, M. D., permitted to rejoin the 4th battalion of artillery.

The regimental order issued on the 13th instant, by Lieutenant C. G. Becher, in command of the 8th Irregular cavalry, appointing Lieut. and Adjutant S. Richards to act as 2d in command, performing at the same time the duties of Adjutant to the corps.

The Cawnpore division orders of the 18th and 19th instant, the former placing the services of Assistant Surgeon C. Harland at the disposal of the Major General Commanding the Saugor division, for employment with the troops in Bundlecund, and the latter directing him to afford medical aid to the 1st company 6th battalion of artillery under orders of march towards Saugor.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is pleased to make the following appointment:

8th Regt. of N. I.—Lieut. and Brevet Capt. J. Fulton to be Adjutant.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

2d Battalion Artillery.—Major H. Delafosse, C. B., from 25th April to 25th Nov., to visit Simlah and its vicinity, on medical certificate.

82d Regt. N. I.—Lieut. J. W. H. Pownall, from 1st May to 1st Nov., to visit Darjeeling and its vicinity, on private affairs.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 29th April, 1843.

At a General Court Martial assembled at Meerut, on Monday, the 17th day of April 1843, Jodah Sing, of the grenadier company, and Khoda Buccus, of the 4th company, both Sepoys of the 27th regiment of native infantry, were arraigned on the following charges:

Charge—" 1st For having deserted from their regiment, when it was on service in Affghanistan, and besieged in the fortress of Ghuznee, and having gone over to the enemy: Jodah Sing, on or about the 9th Jan. 1842, Khoda Buccus, on or about the 13th of January 1842.

" 2d. For having, subsequently, about the month of Oct. 1842, at Cabul, under false pretences, obtained permission to do duty with other regiments on service in Affghanistan: Jodah Sing with the 16th grenadier regiment of native infantry, Khoda Buccus with the 60th regiment native infantry."

Finding.—" The Court, on the evidence before them, are of opinion, that the prisoner Jodah Sing, Sepoy, of the grenadier company 27th regiment of native infantry, is guilty of both the charges preferred against him.

"With regard to Khoda Buccus, Sepoy, of the 4th company 27th regiment of native infantry, the Court are of opinion that he, the prisoner, is guilty of both the charges, with the exception of the words 'and having gone over to the enemy,' of which they do acquit him.

Sentence.—"The Court sentence the prisoner Jodah Sing, Sepoy, of the grenadier company 27th regiment of native infantry, to suffer imprisonment, with hard labour, for a period of two (2) years, and Khoda Buccus, Sepoy, of the 4th company 27th regiment of native infantry, to suffer imprisonment, with hard labour, for a period of one (1) year.

(Signed) "SHAICK SOOBRATTY,
Subadar and President."

Confirmed.

(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General,
and Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

REMARKS BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN INDIA.

The Commander-in-Chief does not concur with the Court as to their finding upon the 2d charge, nor does it appear certain from the evidence, that the prisoner Jodah Sing went over to the enemy, that is, that he deserted from his regiment for the purpose of joining the Affghans.

Giving this prisoner the benefit of the doubt, His Excellency remits one year of the imprisonment with labour, and desires, that the two prisoners, Jodah Sing and Khoda Buccus, may be made over to the civil authority at Meerut, in order that they may severally undergo a year's imprisonment, with hard labour, in the jail of that station.

The following orders are confirmed:

The detachment order issued on the 8th ultimo, by Captain H. Lloyd, commanding the troops at Titalyah, authorizing the hire of a hackery for the conveyance of the sick of a detachment of the 32d regiment of native infantry, on its departure to join the Head Quarters of the corps at Dinapore.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 1st May, 1843.

At a General Court Martial assembled at Cawnpore, on Thursday the 20th day of April 1843, Gunner James Hanlan, No. 2,912, of the 4th company 4th battalion of artillery, was arraigned on the following charges:—

Charges.—"1st. For having, on the afternoon of the 19th of March 1843, at Cawnpore, when on duty at the quarter guard of the 4th battalion of artillery, quitted his guard without leave, and remained absent about three hours.

"2d. For having, on the evening of the same day, made his escape from the battalion quarter guard, in which he had been confined for the offence stated in the first charge.

"3d. For having at the same time, proceeded to the barrack of his company, and there mutinously attempted to stab, with a bayonet, his superior officer, Corporal Thomas Murray, of the same company, being in the execution of his office.

"4th. For having, on the same evening, after having been again confined, repeatedly threatened to take the life of the aforesaid Corporal Thomas Murray."

Finding.—"The Court, from the evidence before them, are of opinion, that the prisoner Gunner James Hanlan, No. 2,912, of the 4th company 4th battalion of artillery, is guilty of all the charges preferred against him, with the exception of the word 'repeatedly' in the 4th charge, of which they do acquit him.

Sentence.—"The Court sentence the prisoner Gunner James Hanlan, No. 2,912, of the 4th company 4th battalion of artillery, to imprisonment in the fortress of Allahabad for one year, and to be kept in solitary confinement for a lunar month of 28 (twenty-eight) days, in the seventh, ninth and eleventh months respectively of such imprisonment.

(Signed) "A CAMPBELL, Col. and
Lieut. Col., 9th Lancers, President."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

The Editor of the Friend of India begs to acknowledge the following donation :

From G. F. Brown, Esq. Co's. Rs. 50, to Serampore College.

The Propagation Society and Puseyism.—By the last Mail the Star received from a correspondent in London, part of a correspondence, relative to a recent secession from the Propagation Society, which supports Bishop's College. Our contemporary has only obtained one portion of the story and it has led him to entertain a suspicion of bigotry against the seceders. We are happy in being able to furnish him with the other limb of it, the perusal of which will, we trust, satisfy him that the seceders have right, reason, and consistency on their side.

Some time back, a meeting of the Auxiliary Propagation Society was held at Cheltenham, when it was stated on the authority of letters from Calcutta, that Tractarianism "prevailed to a frightful extent, among the agents and missionaries of the Society in Calcutta, the practical effect of which was to cut off from the Church of Christ all the faithful protestant labourers in the vineyard, and to introduce disunion and heart-burning among all the protestant bodies." The Revd. Mr. Campbell, the Secretary of the Society, who was present, on being questioned as to the practise of the Board relative to candidates for the Missionary office who had imbibed Puseyite principles, asserted in the most explicit terms that the Board took double pains to exclude such persons from the service of the Society. The declaration was considered perfectly satisfactory by those who had made the enquiry, and some of the Tractarian subscribers intimated their intention to withdraw from the Society.

The subject was subsequently brought under the view of the Board in London, by the Hon. and Revd. Mr. Perceval, one of the individuals with whom the Tractarian movement originated, and who continued for a long time to be one of its most ardent and influential supporters. The Archbishop of Canterbury was in the Chair. At that meeting, the Reverend gentleman was repeatedly assured, that the Board, so far from making the adoption of these peculiar sentiments a ground of rejection, did not so much as make it a matter of enquiry. The subscribers to the Cheltenham Auxiliary Society immediately addressed the Parent Society, pointing out the great discrepancy between the statements of their Secretary, and the sentiments delivered at the Board in the presence of the Primate; and at the close of their letter earnestly entreated that their consciences might be relieved by an assurance from the authorities of the Society, that care was taken by the Candidate's Committee that no persons holding such opinions should be employed by the Society. The reply, which was signed by Mr. Campbell himself, refused any such assurance, and stated that the "Society recognized no theological tests of fitness for its service other than those which are provided in the Liturgy and Articles." The conduct of the Society in this matter is thus described by the Times, which, as an unflinching advocate and abettor of the Tractarian movement, stands second only to the British Critic, now edited by Mr. Newman.

"It is certain that to get the money of those who differ from Mr. Close, a tone of statement quite opposite to Mr. Campbell's, indeed distinctly contradictory of it, is adopted in public and in private by the Society's agents. Letters have appeared in our own journal to the effect that Mr. Campbell's assertions were unfounded, and that counter assertions have been made at Committee Meetings of the Society, in the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, which have passed without protest: The upshot of all seems to be, that while the gentlemen of Cheltenham are requested to subscribe upon the hypothesis that what Mr. Campbell said was true, the gentlemen of Oxford are requested to subscribe upon the hypothesis that what Mr. Campbell said was false. What may be thought of such a principle among archbishops and bishops we shall not presume to conjecture: in the mercantile world it would not be considered honest."

The Revd. Mr. Close, the Revd. Mr. Bickersteth, the Revd. Mr. Pratt, and others consider that the Venerable Society, by refusing to make those extreme opinions which have been promulgated in the Tracts for the Times, and which are openly professed and acted on by its agents and Missionaries abroad, a subject of enquiry, does ipso facto record its judgment and proclaim to the world that they are not inconsistent with the Articles and Liturgy of the Church of England. They have accordingly relinquished their connection with the Society.

It may at first appear somewhat singular, that so firm an adherent of the Church of England as the Revd. Mr. Close, should consider it necessary to separate from a Society, simply because it recognizes no theological tests of fitness for Missionary labours other than those which are provided in the Articles and Liturgy of the Church. But the circumstances of the times impose the necessity of a more explicit avowal of sentiments than is contained in these general expressions. It has been Mr. Newman's object to affix a Tractarian interpretation to the Articles, utterly at variance with the doctrines which distinguish Protestantism from Popery. That School of Divines which is "fast precipitating the Church of England into the bosom of Rome," has no scruple in adopting the same language which has now been used by the Propagation Society. Those who are advocating the invocation of saints, and who maintain the existence of a Purgatory, affect to recognize no theological test other than that which is furnished by the Articles and Liturgy of the Church of England. Those articles have therefore ceased to be any test of an adherence to the peculiar doctrines of the Reformation. If a public Society, when asked for an exposition of its opinion on questions of vital importance on which a division has arisen in the Church, refuses any other reply than that it adheres to the Articles and Liturgy, to which different parties affix opposite interpretations, its reply cannot but be considered equivocal, if not evasive. The refusal of an explanation which every man who repudiates the doctrines advanced by the Oxford School, would cheerfully and explicitly afford, is at once decisive of the bias of the leading members in that Society, and fully justifies the course pursued by Mr. Close and others.

Conquest of Tahiti by the French.—The last Mail brings the melancholy intelligence that the French Government has taken possession of the island of Tahiti. The French journals generally represent the cession as entirely voluntary on the part of the Queen and the chiefs, and exult with the most glowing satisfaction at the annexation of this island and those in its neighbourhood. to the French crown. But there is such incontrovertible evidence that the cession was obtained by violence, that it can be viewed in no other light than as one of the most glaring acts of injustice ever inflicted by a civilized government upon a simple and unoffending people.

The following statement is from a British Resident on the island, who was on the spot when the transaction occurred. On the 1st of September last, the French Frigate of sixty guns, la Reine Blanche, commanded by Admiral du Petit Thouars, arrived at Papetee. For several days the most peaceful intercourse existed between the inhabitants and the French. On the 5th, however, messengers were sent to the Queen at Eimeo, requesting her and her chiefs to come to Papetee, that the Admiral might pay his respects to them. On the 8th the principal chiefs arrived and dined with the Admiral on board. The same evening the British Vice Consul and the American Consul received an official letter from the Admiral, stating that differences existed between the Tahitian and French Governments which might lead to hostilities; and the British and American subjects were warned to secure their property. During that night there was a meeting of the four chiefs with the Admiral, when a document was drawn up and signed by the former, stating that as they were unable to govern the kingdom, in the present circumstances, so as to harmonize with foreign governments, they placed themselves under the protection of France, on certain conditions. The chief of these were, that the internal Government should continue with the Queen and Chiefs; that the Queen should make laws to bind her subjects; that the lands should remain in the hands of the present possessors; that every man should be at liberty to profess the religion which accorded with his own desire; that the places of worship belonging to the English missionaries should remain unmolested; and that the missionaries should continue to perform their duties unmolested, but that the affairs concerning foreign governments, and also concerning foreign residents were to be left with the French Government and the officers appointed by it. The Queen's consent, however, was still wanting to this extraordinary document. The Admiral demanded her signature, or the payment of 10,000 dollars, for alleged injuries, within twenty-four hours; threatening in case of a refusal to plant his flag, fire his guns, and take possession of the island. She was then on the eve of her confinement. She hesitated to seal her own doom, and postponed the signature till within an hour of the time for the bombardment, when she reluctantly put her hand to an instrument which made her the vassal of France. A supreme Council of three Frenchmen was appointed, from whose decision there was to be no appeal but to the king of the French. The Missionaries loudly remonstrated against this arbitrary proceeding;—and a proclamation was issued decreeing that "any person who should either in word or in deed prejudice the Taheitan people against the French Government should be banished." Thus end the civil and the religious liberties of the island of Tahiti.

The pretext for this arbitrary proceeding is, the injuries which were said to have been inflicted on the French. Of these injuries there is no proof. If there were any injuries to complain of, they were committed by, and not upon, the French. As to the voluntary cession of the island,—the earnest solicitation, as the French journals term it, to be admitted to the enjoyment of French protection, it was quite as voluntary as the threat of a bombardment within four and twenty hours if it was rejected, could make it. The helpless natives had not the slightest chance of resisting the French; the first broad side would have levelled the town and scattered the inhabitants. The treaty was literally extorted at the cannon's mouth. The reason of the surrender is stated by the chiefs to be that they were unable to govern their country, under present circumstances, so as to harmonize with foreign governments. But they have been able perfectly to harmonize for many years with the Governments of Great Britain and America, with whom they have come most frequently into contact, and no discord has arisen except with reference to France, and this is altogether of her own creating.

The political importance of this distant possession to France is utterly insignificant. She has little trade in the Pacific, and no interests to protect in that ocean. But the religious results of this perfidious act cannot fail to be most disastrous. The Jesuit's College at Valparaiso will immediately take advantage of it. Roman Catholic Missionaries will be poured into Tahiti, and the Protestant Missions, on which such labour and expense have been bestowed for fifty years, will be rapidly extinguished. These Popish Missions will of course be sent out under the patronage of the French Government, and identified with it. Any exertion on the part of the Protestant Missionaries to protect their converts from Roman Catholic influence, will be construed by those who wield the power of the sword as an attempt to prejudice the Taheitan people against the French Government, and will lead to their instant banishment. The French authorities who found so little difficulty in discovering a pretext for the seizure of the island, will experience still less in finding one for the expulsion of the Missionaries.

Some of the French Journalists openly affirm that this measure has not been adopted without the cognizance of the British Government. Indeed, it is asserted in the Semeur that the assent of the British Government was given to the occupation of Polynesia by the French Government in March 1842. This appears all but incredible. It may be merely an inference drawn from the absence of any vigorous remonstrance with the French Government. Such a remonstrance, for an object of no political moment, may have been deemed impolitic, in the present combustible state of the French. Or it may have been made without being communicated to the Editors of the public journals. At any rate, the reason given by that journal for the apathy of the British Government can scarcely be supposed to apply to Sir Robert Peel, however closely it may be in union with the feelings of Sir Robert Harry Inglis.

"The English Government cannot attach any political importance to the possession of Tahiti by either this power or that; and in relation to religion, they are not Anglican Missionaries, but Dissenters, who have converted Polynesia; there are, therefore, neither lords nor bishops to conciliate; and how keenly soever the intervention of France on behalf of the priests must be felt by the friends to Missions in England, dismayed at seeing compromised in a day a work to which they have devoted half a century, the jealousy of the high Puseyite clergy will be but feebly excited, if it should be at all; nor is there to be feared in the ranks of the nobility, that irritation which a similar outrage committed on Anglican Missionaries would not have failed to produce."

EYRE'S JOURNAL OF AN AFFGHAN PRISONER.—We plead the hacknied excuse "of circumstances beyond our control," for this late notice of Lieut. Eyre's Narrative of military operations at Cabul in the winter of 1841. If the subject had been one of only transient importance we should rather have submitted to the discredit of having overlooked it altogether, than have ventured into the field so long after it has been occupied by our contemporaries. But there is a deep and permanent interest connected with the melancholy events of that period which time will not diminish.

Lieut. Eyre throws but little light on the cause of an insurrection which terminated in so fearful a catastrophe. The warning which he describes Major Pottinger as having given to the Envoy related only to the unsettled state of Kohistan. The idea of a general conspiracy to expel us from the country, the secret of which, though entrusted to hundreds and thousands, was kept with the most scrupulous fidelity, by a people habitually perfidious, is not supported by any evidence as yet before us. It is deemed altogether impossible by the writer in the Edinburgh Review, whose reasoning upon this subject appear to be very conclusive. The fact that the insurrection in Cabul under Ameenoollah and Abdoollah Khan, broke out precisely at the same time with the rising in Kohistan, however, goes far to prove that there was a clear understanding between some of the chiefs who took so prominent a share in subsequent transactions, that an attack should be simultaneously made on our positions, in the hope, that success might attend the effort to expel us from the country.

That the English were regarded by the great body of the people, and more especially by the chiefs, with feelings of the deepest repugnance, will admit of no doubt. It would be difficult, it is true, to bring forward an instance of any country subjugated by the sword, in which the inhabitants had suffered less from the conquerors, than Affghanistan did from our occupation of it. No conquest in the East has ever perhaps been accompanied by fewer violations of the dictates of justice or mercy. To the industrious peasant we had given a degree of freedom and protection previously unknown to him. We had inundated the country with our wealth. We had established a far milder system of administration than the country, with its turbulent and refractory chiefs, had ever enjoyed, or was even prepared for. The same principles which form the points of distinction between our administration in India and that of the Native princes, had been introduced into Affghanistan. —But, we were strangers and infidels, and that in a country where the people have all that tenacity of habits which belongs to mountaineers. We were hated as infidels, and every Mollah in the country was occupied as a missionary, preaching up the virtues of opposition to us. Our presence as conquerors was as distasteful to the people in general as the presence of victorious strangers would have been two centuries ago among the Highlands of Scotland. To the chiefs whose importance had been reduced, and must have become gradually extinct, in proportion as we succeeded in establishing a regular Government, we were particularly obnoxious. The military strength of the Government had formerly consisted of those chiefs and the retainers whom they could respectively enlist under their banners. While they gave their support to the crown, they themselves derived both profit and dignity from the connection. They stood in somewhat the same relation to the King, as the Feudal nobility did to the Plantagenets. It was the aim of the British administration, by the organization of local corps, disciplined by European officers, to dispense with the aid of this uncertain and dangerous militia, and to render the government independent of the Chiefs. Every feeling of pride and self-interest in their minds was enlisted against us. And those feelings of hostility were sharpened by the hauteur of our national character, and by the licentious habits of some who invaded the domestic privacy of respectable families, and wounded the tenderest sensibilities of the Affghan. From these various causes the people had been gradually prepared to take advantage of any outbreak which held out a hope of relieving the country from our hated presence.

The first appearance of disaffection was exhibited in the rebellion of the eastern Ghilzie chiefs, some of whom took an active part in the general insurrection which subsequently burst forth. Early in October they suddenly left Cabul, and, planting themselves with a few followers in the defiles of the Khoord Cabul, plundered a caravan, and cut off all communication between Cabul and India. The ostensible reason of this outbreak, was the reduction which had recently been made in their allowances. Lieut. Eyre lays the blame of this reduction at the door of Lord Auckland, but the writer in the Edinburgh Review, who has evidently had access to the most authentic sources of information, distinctly denies the fact, and asserts that his Lordship was entirely ignorant of the reduction, till after its effects were visible in the stoppage of the passes. It was part of that system of economy which arose from the necessities of Shah Soojah, after he had been told that he must not expect to rely on the resources of the British Government. It was an arrangement determined upon by the Shah and the Envoy. The chiefs were, it appears, called before his Majesty; and the necessity of the reduction was frankly explained to them. They admitted the justice of the measure, and expressed their cheerful acquiescence in it—and immediately took to the road, and commenced a system of extortion and plunder. A considerable force was sent under Sir Robert Sale to clear the passes, and it was constrained to fight every inch of its way to Tezeen, where Capt. Macgregor proceeded into the hills and concluded a treaty with the chiefs, the terms of which were far too lenient. Indeed the wisdom of concluding any treaty whatsoever with so treacherous a foe is much to be questioned. The moderation of the negotiator was as usual regarded as a token of fear, and served only to encourage the rebels in their opposition to our authority. With men who had thus basely attacked our troops night and day for more than ten days, without any excuse except their dislike of the established Government of the country, it was impolitic to hold any amicable conference. The first measure these chiefs adopted after they had signed the treaty in good faith, was to violate it. They made every effort to increase their retainers; they occupied every salient point in the passes; they crowned the inaccessible heights and poured a murderous fire from their long rifles on our columns as they toiled through the defiles; and the injury inflicted on Sir Robert Sale's force after the hollow and deceitful truce, was far greater than any which it had suffered before. He made his way however bravely to Gundamuck, by a series of conflicts conducted under the most appalling circumstances, and in the most disadvantageous positions. If the military skill, the courage, and the perseverance displayed by that noble band of soldiers in their march from Cabul to Gundamuck does not occupy that prominent place in the military annals of this period to which it is entitled, it is only because it has been eclipsed by the more glorious defence of Jellalabad by the same brigade.

The insurrection of Cabul broke out on the morning of the 2d of November. Nothing has appeared as yet to identify it with the opposition offered to Sir Robert Sale by the eastern Ghilzies, though the circumstance of its having occurred as soon as it was known in Cabul that the General had cleared the passes and was in a position from whence he could afford no succour to the troops in Cabul, may give some colour to such a supposition. The immediate cause of the outbreak in the Capital, as stated by Sir William Macnaghten, in a memorandum in the possession of his widow, was a seditious letter addressed by Abdoolla Khan to several chiefs of influence at Cabul stating that it was the design of the Envoy to seize and send them to London. The principal rebels met on the night of the 1st of November, and working on the inflammable feelings of the people of Cabul, they pretended that the king had issued an order to put all infidels to death. They had previously forged an order for our destruction by washing out the contents of a genuine paper with the exception of the seal, and substituting their own wicked inventions. It appears that a respectable Affghan, Taj Mahomed, on that same night gave information of the conspiracy to Sir A. Burnes, and put him on his guard against treachery, but his assertions were received with incredulity, and he retired in disgust. The next morning three hundred men attacked Sir Alexander Burnes and murdered him, together with his brother and Lieut. William Broadfoot, plundered Captain Johnson's treasury and set fire to the houses of the British residents in the city. Lieut. Eyre describes the insurrection as having been at first only an insignificant ebullition of discontent on the part of a few desparate and restless men, which Military energy and promptitude might have crushed in the bud. It is of no avail now to say that Sir A. Burnes ought not to have exposed himself to destruction by continuing to reside in the city after the feelings of hostility on the part of the chiefs, had for nearly a month assumed so decisive an appearance. His residence within the city after such warning is but one of the many errors which marked our proceedings at that critical period. But what shall we say to the sluggishness, the culpable indecision which was exhibited on that fatal day, the 2d of November, on which the doom of our army may be said to have been virtually sealed? The insurrection was trifled with till it became unmanageable. Thus it was also in the recent riot of Bristol, and the more ancient riots of London in the time of Lord George Gordon, in which the same inactivity produced corresponding effects. An exhibition of salutary energy on the first ebullition of popular rage would have prevented the conflagration of those cities; and the adoption of the most energetic measures immediately after intelligence had reached the cantonments that Sir Alexander and his associates had been murdered, and the treasury plundered, and as soon as the smoke of blazing houses was seen, would have overawed the insurgents and possibly prevented the final catastrophe. But Sir William Macnaghten made light of the outbreak, and still continued to rely with confidence on the friendly dispositions of the people, and General Elphinstone, with all his personal bravery, wavered. General Shelton was sent with a few troops to the Bala Hissar, to watch the progress of events and to act on his own judgement; and he did nothing but watch till it was too late to act. A few of Shah Soojah's body guard, and some of Campbell's Hindoostanees, comprized the whole number of troops sent to put down the insurrection. They were beaten back, and two hundred of the King's guards slaughtered and two of the guns destroyed. "The day was suffered to pass, says Lieut. Eyre, without anything being done, demonstrative of British energy and power." The golden moments for action were lost. The insurgents had murdered our countrymen, plundered their property and burned their houses with perfect impunity within a mile of our cantonments and under the very walls of the Bala Hissar. It was manifest to the insurgents, that this small ebullition of popular rage had paralyzed our public functionaries. All those whose friendship for us was based on a belief of our power, first hesitated, and then turned against us. The first day was the crisis which determined the events of the campaign. The ground we lost on that day of inaction, was never recovered.

THE BLUE BOOK.—A correspondent of the Hurkaru, A Voice from the North West, has made some observations on our review of the Blue Book, which seem to require notice. He says that we are at last obliged to confess that Lord Auckland was the first to give that order which directed the British troops to withdraw immediately, after relieving the beleagured garrisons from Affghanistan. We object to the use of the words "at last obliged to confess," as being altogether uncalled for and unfair. We have never manifested the least reluctance to acknowledge that Lord Auckland issued the first order to retire; and for the best of all good reasons, because this order was unknown to us, as we believe it was to our contemporaries, till the appearance of the Blue Book. We were fully aware that Lord Auckland had determined, whenever our troops should be withdrawn from Affghanistan, not to send them again across the Indus. The Hurkaru, we think, on more than one occasion, questioned the correctness of this assertion, because, he had nothing for it but our word. It was partly to shew our contemporary that we had not been speaking at random, that we quoted those passages from the Blue Book, which bore out the statement we had made; viz. that if the victories achieved by Generals Nott and Pollock had been gained while Lord Auckland was at the head of the Government, he would have gladly availed himself of the opportunity of retiring honourably from Affghanistan. The Correspondent is moreover incorrect in saying that Lord Auckland was the first to give the order which drew forth so much disapprobation from us. His Lordship's orders, as far as we are admitted behind the scenes by the Book in question, appear to have sanctioned nothing beyond a retrogade movement on Peshawur, where a powerful army was to be assembled, with a view to the redemption of our honour in Affghanistan. Lord Ellenborough's order embraced the immediate and final abandonment of the country, while our national reputation was unvindicated, and the captives were yet in the hands of the enemy. The first order was apparently dictated by prudence; the last by a panic.

The Correspondent seems to think General Pollock has not received the due mead of praise fo the part he bore in evading or resisting the orders to retire, and that too much of the merit of the campaign is apparently ascribed to General Nott. This is not altogether the case; though it is manifest that the documents published in the Blue Book give more of the merit of this successful movement to the Candahar than to the Jellalabad General. The impression of the public coincides with that of the Correspondent on the fact, that a very spirited remonstrance was sent by General Pollock against the order he had received to abandon the country. That letter, which many of our friends were the first to look for in the Book, is not to be found in it. It may have been omitted by accident; it may possibly have been suppressed intentionally; but we should be very reluctant to admit the idea that while the Ministry published General Nott's energetic remonstrance against Lord Auckland's order to retire, they knowingly withheld from public view General Pollock's equally firm protest against Lord Ellenborough's order to quit the country. There are evidences of impartiality, we had almost said of generous consideration, in the selection of these documents, which forbid us to entertain such a thought. But from whatever cause the omission arose, it is much to be regretted, because it deprives the gallant General of the credit due to his moral courage.

A Voice from the North West is perfectly correct in saying, that if General Pollock had obeyed the orders he received and retired to Peshawur, we should in all probability never have advanced to Cabul; and instead of the triumphs which we now view with feelings of just pride, our national character would have been covered with the deepest humiliation. Still, the spirited letter of General Nott to Brigadier England, ordering him positively to leave Quetta, where he intended apparently to remain acting on the defensive, and which constrained him to move up to Candahar, was the event on which the subsequent advance of the troops to Cabul turned. General Nott had just been invested with the uncontrolled responsibility of all affairs political as well as military, and the first use he made of these enlarged powers, was to order up Brigadier England with his convoy. Had that convoy not reached Candahar, General Nott could not have moved on Cabul, and the Governor General would never have ordered him to move. It was the knowledge that General Nott was thus fully equipped for any enterprize by the arrival of these reinforcements, that furnished one of the chief inducements to Lord Ellenborough to "retire by way of Cabul." Perhaps we ought rather to say, that when His Lordship was roused to attempt the recovery of our prisoners and our honor, by the force of public opinion at home and in India, it was the junction of the two Generals at Candahar, which furnished him with a pretext for renewing the war, as well as with the means of securing our ultimate triumph. Among the concurring causes of this triumphant movement, the reinforcement of General Nott's army was the most powerful, and deserves therefore to be distinguished from all the other events of the year.

Reconstruction of the Secretariat.—Lord Ellenborough has just remodelled the Secretariat of the Supreme Government and that of the province of Bengal. The perplexing divisions of the old regime have been swept away, and the various designations of Secret and Political and Ecclesiastical and Separate departments abolished, and we have one Home and one Foreign Secretary with a complement of assistants, under the title of Under Secretaries. The appointment is limited to men of junior standing in the service who are not entitled to a salary of more than 1000 Rupees a month. As soon as their claim to higher allowances has been matured, their noviciate will cease, and they will be remanded to the interior of the country to act as Magistrates and Collectors. There will thus be a constant succession of men training up for the appointment; and the country will always possess the half wrought materials for manufacturing a good Secretary whenever that office may become vacant. In some respects it will be advantageous to the administration to have the field of selection so much enlarged. But there is one individual whose convenience seems to have been altogether overlooked in this arrangement; we allude to the Secretary himself. His own personal labours have been necessarily increased by the accumulation of so many departments on his unfortunate shoulders; and those labours are rendered the more severe by the absence of any one fitted by official aptitude and experience to share them. To these labours will now be added that of training up the Under Secretaries, with the dismal prospect that as soon as they are qualified to render him efficient assistance, they will be removed from the office and planted elsewhere, and that he will be required to undertake the same course of tuition with a new batch of scholars. Thus the office becomes a kind of Academy for the education of candidates for the Secretariat, and the Secretary himself is transformed into a Schoolmaster.

The separation of the office of Secretary to the Government of Bengal from that of Secretary to the Government of India is a measure of such obvious propriety that the only wonder is how the two offices ever came to be united. The business of the Bengal division which contains a population of forty millions of people, and which comprizes the departments of Judicial, Fiscal and Criminal jurisprudence, of the Customs, Salt and Opium, the Ecclesiastical, and Marine department and that of Internal and External Steam navigation, the Post office, the Abkaree, and Education, was quite enough for the brains of one man, and it was only a matter of justice to relieve him from all connection with the Government of India. The absurdity of a man's writing letters to himself and having the honour to be his own most obedient humble servant, will now cease. But the Governor General, or the President in Council, and the Governor of Bengal, will continue to be one and the same person, and we shall still be amused occasionally with the assurance, that Lord Ellenborough, the Governor of Bengal, had been very repugnant to such and such a measure, but that his objections had been overcome by the powerful and close reasoning of Lord Ellenborough, the Governor General in Council.

The Calcutta Bible Society's Spelling Law.—It will be remembered that some months since, an elaborate paper was issued by the Committee of the Calcutta Bible Society, on the proper spelling of the sacred name of Jesus, in the Oordoo translation of the Scriptures; and that the Committee, having satisfied themselves on the point, resolved that no translation or edition of the sacred volume should have their support, in which their spelling was not adopted. Without questioning the soundness of the Committee's etymological argument, we felt it to be our duty, at the time, to protest against the adoption of so unimportant a matter as a party shibboleth, still farther to divide the too feeble body of Translators of the word of God, and against the use of so imperative a domination over the judgement and conscience of the translators,—to whom Bible Societies are debtors for all their opportunity of communicating the Scriptures to Heathen lands. A member of the Committee, defended that body, in our columns, on the ground that, by their official responsibility, they were under obligation to expend the money of their constituents only on versions of the Scriptures, which were, to the best of their judgement, in every respect, faithful transcripts of the original: and he required of us to expound the principles on which the responsibility of Bible Societies and liberty of conscience in Translators should be reconciled—or the rules according to which they ought mutually to yield. We admitted the importance of the theme, and promised to give it our best consideration. We have not however had leisure to fulfil the promise. And the difficulties of the question have not diminished, from the reflection we have been able occasionally to bestow upon it. It is evident, that a separate responsibility and right of judgement may be claimed for both Societies and Translators, and that in co-operation these must be reconciled. In many cases, collision might be removed by friendly discussion. In others, difficulties might be got over by the adoption of a middle course, unobjectionable to either party. But, after all, points will occur on which irreconcileable differences arise: and what is to be done with them? It is easy to say, that the less competent judge ought to yield to the more competent: but who shall judge of the comparative competence of the opposite parties? Frequently the judgement of the solitary translator, imbued by long study and practice with the principles of scripture interpretation and translation, and perfectly at home in the language he has to use, may be worth more than that of a whole Committee, even with a score of ministers of the gospel, possessing the average measure of professional accomplishments. We have known the Committee of the Calcutta Auxiliary Society referred to, as judges on the merits of translations, into languages of which no one member knew a single word: and other Committees may be in a like condition. In such a case, their judgement upon numerous points can be of no value at all. Indeed, in the majority of instances, where Bible Societies in Europe or America give support to translations into new languages, they can have no security that they are doing well, but in the character of the Translator whom they assist. In other cases, as at Calcutta, we fear that difficulties will in actual practice be got over, on the coarse and vulgar principle of the weaker party going to the wall: and to lay down precise rules by which they ought to be got over, must be impossible, as long as the conditions in Committees and Translators are so variable.

Nevertheless, in this, as in most other things, evils have a self rectifying power: and we may yet see an approximation to what is right, without being able to lay down precise rules for the purpose. When Bible Society Committees find, that they have alienated from them so many valuable translators, that they can no longer get a creditable version to print—or when their arbitrary proceedings have awakened so much sympathy for the translators on whom they would put their yoke, as to turn public disgust against themselves, and their treasury consequently becomes empty—they will feel that the exercise of even their great power must be tempered with consideration and forbearance. The Calcutta Committee have had considerable pre-eminence in working out this salutary result. They took an early part in the agitation which has deprived all the Bible Societies throughout the world, of further co-operation from the translators of the Baptist Denomination. And now their spelling mania has separated from them—has arrayed against them, the whole body of Protestant Missionaries in Upper India, amounting to twenty-seven individuals, of the Presbyterian, the Episcopalian and Independent Denominations. The Baptists, of course, were lost before. Amongst our selections will be found the Circular in which the views of these Missionaries are communicated to the various Bible Societies of Christendom. It is a counter blast to the Calcutta circular, of the strength of which our readers will form their own judgement. For ourselves, we retain the opinion, that the subject is of exceedingly small intrinsic importance: and the blame is therefore the greater, of those who chose it for a condition of union, or rather an element of division. Their conduct bears too great a resemblance to that of the oppressors of the Puritans, in testing orthodoxy by the cut of a cap or a scarf. Since this discussion began, we have observed that a recent traveller in Russia says, that a sect has arisen in that country, whose single, essential peculiarity is a particular mode of spelling this same name of Jesus. Have some of their members come amongst us—or is it only their spirit that has reached Calcutta?

The Benevolent Institution.—We have been favoured with the Twenty-fourth Report of this valuable Institution, which after the lapse of thirty-four years still continues to enjoy the unabated confidence of the public. Of the various institutions established in the metropolis for the diffusion of knowledge during the present century, this Seminary stands first in point of time, and, considering the number of vic-tions which it has been instrumental in rescuing from the dominion of vice and ignorance, it may justly be considered as second to none in importance. To trace its origin, would carry us back to that happy period when sectarian distinctions were scarcely known, and Churchmen and Dissenters cordially co-operated in the promotion of objects of public utility; when the Senior Chaplain at the Presidency, and the Serampore Missionaries united their efforts for the establishment of an Institution which should pick up from the streets of Calcutta and impart instruction to the numerous children, bearing the Christian name, whose ignorance and immorality only served to reflect dishonour on it. The benevolence of the design and the zeal of those who originated it, immediately secured for it a large measure of public support, which has continued with little abatement, though with occasional fluctuation to the present time. The magnificent subscriptions of 2, 3, 4 and 500 Rs. which were poured into it, when the claims on public liberality were few, and the merchants of Calcutta were princes, and the shears had not been applied to the allowances of the public servants, cannot be expected at this time of day, but the numerical list of Subscribers amounting as they do to two hundred and thirty, sufficiently proves that the Institution is as great a favourite with the public as it has ever been.

The Report informs us that in the Boys' Department there are Three hundred and three children, divided into seven classes: in that of the Girls, One hundred and twenty-five, making in all Four hundred and twenty-eight. This is probably the number on the Register; but if we make the usual deduction of one fourth for absentees we shall still have an average attendance of Three Hundred and Twenty-one. The entire expense of the Two Schools does not exceed 500 Rupees a month, or less than two Rupees a month for each child. We question whether it be possible to impart efficient instruction to children, many of whom are in European habits, for a less sum; and it is evident that the expenditure is kept within these moderate limits only by a constant and conscientious economy. We are sure that we need not say a word to any of our subscribers to induce them to continue their support to this valuable seminary; but there may be some among them possessed of a small unappropriated floating balance, which they are anxious to lay out to the best advantage for others; to them we would not hesitate to refer the claims of an Institution which has been distinguished for more than a quarter of a century for doing much good with small means.

ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF THE FINE ARTS IN SCOTLAND.—A friend has sent us a copy of the Report of the Committee of Management of this National Association, with a request that we would assist him in bringing it to the notice of his own countrymen in India, many of whom are probably ignorant of its existence. The Association was formed several years back with the view of promoting the Fine Arts in Scotland, and of preserving in the country the productions of native genius, which for want of suitable encouragement, were dispersed abroad. The plan of the Association is extremely simple. Every subscriber of one Guinea, is a member of the Society for one year, and is entitled to one chance; of two Guineas to two chances, and so on. The whole amount of Annual Subscriptions, is devoted, after the payment of necessary expenses to the purchase of a selection from the works of Scottish Artists exhibited at the annual exhibitions, with this exception that the Committee of Management is empowered to engrave for distribution among the members such works of Art as may appear worthy of the distinction. The Committee consists of fifteen gentlemen who are not Artists, ten of whom go out annually. Upon the close of the Exhibitions, the different works purchased for the association become, by lots publicly drawn, the property of individual members.

The support which the Association has experienced during the last three years, has been highly encouraging. In the year 1839-40, the subscriptions were £6396; in 1840-41, £6767; and in the year 1841-42, they were £6590. The number of actual subscribers amounts to not fewer than 6277; of these one contributor has 6 shares; 8 have 5 shares; 14 have 3 shares; 184 have 2 shares, and 5821 have one share each of a Guinea. The number of works of Art purchased in the year embraced by the Report was 147, at a cost of £4581.

The Association appears thus to have been the instrument of giving a great impulse to the progress of the Fine Arts in Scotland. Before its establishment, not £1000 was distributed among native artists in six years. The sum at present thus employed in encouraging native talent is £6000 a year. But the beneficial influence of the Society has not been confined to North Britain. The English and the Irish have caught the infection; and there is now a sum of not less than Thirty Thousand Pounds Sterling contributed annually in the United Kingdom by means of the Association and kindred institutions to the promotion of taste and the encouragement of its professors.

AERIAL STEAM SHIP.—We have been requested to state that the drawing of the Aerial Steam Ship has been lithographed at the Englishman office, where copies, either plain or coloured, may be obtained. Though some affect to believe it will never bring our mails, yet is an object of considerable interest and the credulous and incredulous may both unite in supplying themselves with copies of it.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 25.

— The papers of this morning are so closely occupied with the European news brought by the Mail, as to afford little support to our weekly summary of Indian news. Indeed, beyond the assurance that Lord Ellenborough has positively made up his mind to proceed to the Hills, there is scarcely an item of intelligence.

— The private lotteries which have sprung up on the discontinuance of the State Lottery, have been the subject of animadversion in the papers within the last week. An anonymous correspondent, Verbum sat, has stated the singular fact that in a lottery consisting of 1500 tickets there are frequently not more than 40 or 50 sold, the value of which serves to cover the expense of the lottery and affords a little surplus; the projectors trust for their remuneration to the chance of some of the larger prizes turning up in their favour. In a lottery now drawing by Methold and Co. two writers in the papers have distinctly called on them to give up the names of the individuals to whose ticket the large prize of 44,000 Rs. fell. They have chosen to consider the enquiry as an attack, and have demanded the name of the writer. It has been surrendered; yet they continue to withhold the name of the fortunate holder, and the natural inference is that it fell to their own lot.

— The Precursor, says the Englishman, in an answer to correspondents, is rotting in dock. Whether the dry rot has seized her timbers we have not heard, but that she is perfectly idle, and losing money every day to the projectors, is of course beyond question. It was currently reported, that Major Henderson, who left Calcutta on the Steamer some little time back, was entrusted with powers to dispose of her definitively. It is a thousand pities she was not in the hands of the Peninsular and Oriental Company. We might then expect to start fair at the beginning of next year, with three excellent vessels.

FRIDAY, MAY 26.

— The intelligence from Scinde, though not very particular, is important. It is much to be questioned whether Sir Charles Napier's assertion that it would not be necessary to fire another shot in Scinde, will not turn out quite as premature as Lord Ellenborough's declaration of peace in Asia. The Belochees have formed themselves into small bands, and employed themselves in stopping our communications and intercepting our supplies. The Regiments have lost every thing that was coming from Bombay and have been obliged to send to Ferozepore to supply their wants. A considerable detachment had been sent on to Sehwan. With an active and inveterate foe, the occupation of the country will be accompanied with great vexation and expense. We hold three or four isolated posts, which have no regular intercourse with each other. The Ameers are conquered, but the country is not. Sir Charles greatly felt the want of European troops, and it was resolved therefore to send a portion of the Highlanders, the 78th, by Steam, though the coast cannot be approached without the greatest danger at this season of the year.

— Dost Mahomed is said in the Delhi Gazette to have got safely through the Khyber, and to have reached Jellalabad. It is not many days since the Star announced his arrival at Cabul. We are now informed that he is doing every thing in his power to instigate the Affghans against the Seikhs. The idea of his continuing on friendly terms with them, while they hold Peshawur, which he covets, is preposterous.

— There have been rumours in the papers of Shere Sing's dangerous illness; and some reports have actually put him to death. Upon this rumour is built the supposition that Mr. Clerk's visit to Lahore has reference to the state of the King's health, and the disturbances which will probably arise on his death. But all the rumours regarding movements and events in the Punjab are so varied and so contradictory, that there is little safety except in mistrusting them all alike.

SATURDAY, MAY 27.

— The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states, that private letters had been received from Marseilles which announce that the Queen had been safely delivered of a son. The Telegraph might have conveyed to that port intelligence five days later than that received by the Mail from London, and the intelligence may therefore have some more solid foundation than the public wishes.

— The Bombay papers state, that the active and energetic services of the Superintendent of the Indian Navy is to be honoured with a patent of Knighthood. This, as the papers truly state, will be an honour equally to the Government and the individual. If the home Government was a little less niggardly of its honours, and was to bestow them more liberally for services rendered to the state in India, the stimulus to exertion would be abundantly increased. The honours bestowed on Sir Henry Pottinger and Sir W. Macnaghten for political services, though highly deserved, were intended primarily to strengthen the Whig interest at home. Their value was somewhat deteriorated by their having been bestowed at the same time with the title given to Lord Keane; but when shall we see an honest, impartial and generous acknowledgment of those services in India, other than military, by which this empire is built up and adorned?

— The Star mentions that the Standard of the 6th of April states, that Mr. Wordsworth had actually accepted the post of Poet Laureate, in consequence of communications from Sir Robert Peel and the Lord Chamberlain.

— The Hurkaru informs us that Mr. G. W. Johnson, formerly assistant Editor of the Englishman, and lately sole Editor of the Courier, is on the eve of publishing a book, styled "Three years in Calcutta." It will comprize, it is said, much information relative to the late administration of Lord Auckland.

— A volume of Reports of cases adjudged by the Sudder Court, from 1830 to 1834, has just been published by Mr. Sutherland, Secretary to the Law Commission. We have not seen the work, but the Hurkaru hints, that it is disfigured by an attempt to write native names according to the Romanized system. If this plan has been adopted, the value of the work will have been not a little diminished.

MONDAY, MAY 29.

— A Delhi Gazette Extra of the 18th May, just received, created a hope that it might announce another triumph of Sir Charles Napier, as the Beloochees were known to have collected in large numbers in the vicinity of Hydrabad; but it contained no other intelligence than that of a panic into which the Military authorities at Subathoo had been thrown by an idle rumour, that the Lahore Government had instigated the Hill tribes to rise and cut off three European Regiments in the Hills. It was also added that 15,000 men were to assemble immediately and expel us.

— The City Article of the Hurkaru states, that the last Mail brought 15 lakhs of Rupees on account of the merchants from England. It was stated in the Overland Mail, that Government intended to discontinue the advances on shipments in this country, and to draw the requisite funds from India by Bills given in London on the local authorities to the extent of more than two millions sterling. The Hurkaru says, that there is some expectation that the next Mail will bring orders to pay the Opium indemnity here, but the amount of compensation had not been settled when the Mail left, and there is apparently a difference of more than a million sterling between the demand of the merchants, and the concession of the Ministry.

— The latest intelligence from Scinde is to the 8th of May from Kerachee. H. M. 28th had left that place for Hydrabad, but the regiment had been severely visited with sickness since its arrival in Scinde. More than a hundred were in hospital, and they were dying at the rate of two or three in a day. It is said that Shere Mahomed has sent a message to General Napier to say, that as they had fought two battles for their country, he wished one more battle for religion. The reply was, that he should come on, and that as soon as he was near enough to Hydrabad he should have enough of fighting.

TUESDAY, MAY 30.

— The Star states that the Governor General is actually on his return to Calcutta. It is said that his Lordship somewhat suddenly declared his intention of coming down to Allahabad with the whole of his civil and military suite.

— The discussion regarding the Lottery of Methold and Co. has ceased, by their continued refusal of the name of the individual to whom the largest prize fell. The publication of the number, which came up with the rich prize will not satisfy the public. Suspicion is abroad that the Minor Lotteries are not conducted with that fairness which marked the Government Lotteries, and these suspicions can be removed only by the distinct publication of the names of the winners. The refusal of the names will at once turn public suspicions into certainty.

— The number of letters and covers despatched by the Steamer Cleopatra from Bombay to London, as well as the number received by the Victoria, from Europe, is thus given in the Bombay papers.

Memorandum of the number of Covers received by the Steamer Victoria, on the 14th April, 1843.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31.

— No farther particulars have been received respecting the rumoured rising of the Hill tribes at Subathoo, to drive us back into the plains; and there can be little doubt of its being a false alarm. General Sir John McCaskill however has taken every precaution against surprize. That the Hill men are not over pleased with the location of three beef eating Regiments of Europeans among their flocks and herds, may be easily understood; but that Shere Singh should mix himself up in a conspiracy against the English, and thus endanger his crown, which is ricketty enough already, is—less credible than the promised visit of the Aerial.

— Lord Ellenborough, according to the common voice of the public press, comes down immediately to Calcutta. His Lordship travels by dawk to Allahabad, where he takes steam, and moves down to the city of Palaces. Mr. G. Clerk, "unquestionably the ablest man in the North Western Provinces," will be appointed Governor of Agra so long as that office lasts.

— The Star states, that the statue of the Marquis of Wellesley recently brought out in the Justina, is the gift of the Court of Directors. The money publicly subscribed by the community in India for the statue, never reached its destination; why, our contemporary does not explain. Of course we are at full liberty to suspect that there was foul play. The statue remained in the Studio of Chantry unredeemed. That eminent Sculptor died about the same time as the eminent Statesman, and the Court of Directors immediately purchased the statue from his executors, and have handsomely presented it to the city of Calcutta.

— The Englishman states, that the Barometer at 6 P. M. yesterday was far below the average of last year, just before the terrific gale. The Master Attendant sent round a Circular to all the ships in the river to prepare for foul weather. A Northwester began up here about ¼ past seven, lulled after half past eight, and commenced again at half past twelve, a little after midnight. The lightning and thunder were terrific, and for ten minutes it blew as violently at any period of last year's gale.

— The Englishman announces the appearance of Mr. Stocqueler's Memorials of the War in Affghanistan, from October 1838 to November 1842. We hope to receive our own copy before our next issue, and shall then be enabled to review it.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

BHAUGULPORE BRANCH AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Pursuant to Resolution No. 6 of the Society's Proceedings, dated the 11th of April last, the first show of Flowers, Fruits, and Vegetables took place this 10th day of May 1843, at Cleveland House.

The attendance of both European and Native Gentlemen was most numerous, indeed the Show Room was quite crowded and was honoured with the presence of the Ladies of the station.

The Floricultural Department contained many rare specimens of the beauties of Flora, and the very healthy appearance of the flowers indicated the superiority of the Bhaugulpore climate even in the month of May.

In the Fruit Department there were some very fine Peaches, Leechees, Alloo Bokharas, Plantains, &c. Some of the Peaches weighed 14 Rupees each. In the Vegetable Department the most conspicuous specimen was a bundle of Asparagus of unusual size from the garden of P. Onmet, Esq. Finer was never seen in Calcutta or even England.

Some new Potatoes from Madras seed of very good size, from the garden of G. F. Brown, Esq. excited much attention from the circumstance of the seed having been planted in February as an experiment, and the fruit gathered in May, thus proving that two crops of Potatoes can be raised in one year.

A third crop is now expected from seed planted in April, the plant being now healthy in appearance. Beet root and Celery were next looked at, and both were of full size and in the finest order. A basket of Cucumbers from the garden of J. Glas, Esq. was remarkable for the size, color, and fresh appearance of the fruit. Some Carrots (grown from English seed) from the garden of Captain Bore, were exceedingly fine, both in color and size. There were some very fine Leeks from the garden of J. Pontet, Esq.

Several dallees from the gardens of Native Gentlemen contained some very good samples of vegetables and fruit, and from the improvements their gardens are undergoing it is supposed the competition at our next show on the 1st of November, will be very great and exciting. The Prizes described in the appended List were then awarded by the Judges.

A sample of Clover reared from Cabul seed by Baboo Gooroo Churn Mitter, looked very healthy and had the blossom on it.

Since the last report of our Proceedings, 12½ bigahs of excellent ground (Lakaraj) in a beautiful situation, have been purchased and much progress in fashioning and laying out the garden has been made.

The name of Baboo Gooroo Churn Mitter as a Donor and Monthly Subscriber: was inadvertently omitted in our last report; he is a most intelligent and zealous member of the institution. The Society has to accord its best acknowledgments for the following Donations.

To J. Glas, Esq. for a valuable collection of Cotton seeds, viz. Mexican, Sea Island, Seychelle, together with samples of the Cotton.

To R. F. Hodgson, Esq. Magistrate of Monghyr, for a fine Cape Oak plant.

To Walter Landale, Esq. for some very fine Bamboos, for making a Chevaux de frise for the Garden Hedge.

To C. C. Bruce, Esq. for a pair of handsome China Garden Seats.

To A. Johnson, Esq. for a bottle of very superior Arrow Root, the produce of his (the Lal Bagh) garden.

The increase of Monthly Subscribers since last report is as follows:—

For the above very liberal Donations and the continued increase of Monthly Subscribers, the Society return their united sincere thanks and best acknowledgments.

The Society has determined upon giving proper attention to the Agricultural Department, and as the produce of the present harvest is very indifferent both in the size and quantity of the Grain, it is quite clear that an importation of good Seed would prove highly beneficial to the district. Potatoes and Garden seeds will be largely distributed, a change of seed of the former very much wanted.

Prizes for Cotton, Sugar Cane, Oats, Wheat, Barley, Peas, and the like, will be given in due season. A Cattle show for Bullocks, Cows, Sheep, &c. the produce of the Bhaugulpore and neighbouring districts is under consideration.

A public market is about to be established near the public garden and it is believed that Grain, Vegetables. Fruits, &c. will be brought for sale in large quantities.

Thus the price of grain and other commodities will, it is hoped, soon become cheaper, and gradually descend to that reasonable price at which it was disposed of two years ago when no great monopoly existed. This plan has been explained to several Natives, and it is their opinion that it will not only work well, but that we shall be able eventually to have two market days a week.

By order of the Society.

CALCUTTA THE AUXILIARY BIBLE SOCIETY.

To the Committee of the Society, in

DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST,

We have been informed that the Com. of the Cal. Aux. Bible Society have laid before you a printed Overture requesting your approbation and co-operation in their Resolution to change the sacred name of our Saviour from "Isá" to "Yusúa" in the translations of the scriptures hereafter to be printed in the Urdu dialect. We feel solicitous that you should be in possession of all available information when you come to the decision of a question so important in its bearings.

We come not before you as the "accusers of our Brethren" in Calcutta; but under the impression that our Brethren in Calcutta; from their Geographical position, and other incidental causes, were not, at the time of issuing their Minute, as fully in possession of the views and information of those most directly and deeply concerned in this change, as it were desirable to be, previous to pushing a question of such importance to its final issue.

As the translations of the scriptures affected by the contemplated change are chiefly used in N. India, and comparatively little used in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, we feel that we who live and labour in this part of India are peculiarly interested in the change.

Some 6 or 8 months ago the Cal. Com. sent out a printed Circular, to a large number of Missionaries in N. India, containing a specimen sheet of the system in which they contemplated hereafter printing scripture Proper Names. Among these was the name of our Saviour. But as it was there spelled "Yisu" a form recently adopted, and very unacceptable to most of those concerned in the practical application of it, and not at all likely ever to come into current use, it was not thought advisable to wound the feelings of those who had introduced the term, and was therefore passed over with a simple expression of disapprobation. But had the Missionaries been aware of the position about to be taken by the Com. they would generally have given a much more decided reply. The Com. have made the return thus inadvertently given, the basis of their contemplated change.

We will notice the prominent reasons given in the minute of the Cal. Com. as briefly as we can.

1st. That in the term "Isá"* the order of the Hebrew letters is inverted, and the meaning of the name sacrificed. This argument will have force only with those who have some familiarity with the Hebrew Grammar, which perhaps not one in ten thousand Hindoos and Mahomedans has. Again, it is not a matter of high importance whether the letters forming the name have any definite meaning in themselves or not. The first time the name is introduced into the New Testament, viz. Matt. 1. 21. it is announced—"thou shalt call his name JESUS, because he shall save his people from their sins." This distinctly defines the name, and sufficiently for all practical purposes, whether it be represented by the letters Isá, Yisú, Yusúa or Yushua. And as it is admitted that the letters forming the name of Isá have no other meaning, why not allow the definition given by the Angel to be sufficient. The fact that Yusua and Yashua and Yuhashúa were interchangeable names in Heb. and this name common to many others besides our blessed Saviour, shows that the point of high importance was not the inherent power, or order of the letters of the name, but the attributes and character of the person wearing the name.

2nd. The argument drawn from the practice of Martyn, &c. From the perusal of the translations of Martyn and Thomason it seems that they sought out with care and discrimination the popular, generally understood terms used to designate scripture names, and used them without hesitation, leaving the philological question to be settled or not afterwards as circumstances might dictate. Thus no argument can be fairly drawn on either side from the practice of those dear departed men.

3rd. That Mahammed intentionally corrupted the name of the Saviour with a view to obscure his glory and depreciate his character. Of this there appears no direct or satisfactory evidence. And even if the assumption be true, still the question has long time ceased to be one of real importance. There is the same, nay stronger reason to believe that the term "Christian" was at first opprobriously given at Antioch, and in the surrounding countries. But the term has long since ceased to carry with it any ignominious force. And no one feels the least apprehension of evil from the continued use of it. It is an attribute of goodness to live down and neutralize the force of any calumnious or invidious epithets that may be heaped upon it. Thus whatever may have been the design of introducing the term "Isá" at first, it has long since ceased to have any other force than as a designation of Him who came to "save his people from their sins." And it has acquired by the uninterrupted usage of 12 centuries, a sacredness little short of that of Yusua in Hebrew, and has become so completely entwined around every fibre of Mahommadan and Christian Literature in India, that it seems like doing them a common injury to wrest it from them. And the idea of restoration of the primitive form of the name, loses almost all its force in Hindoostan, where the primitive term never had an existence.

4th. That "Yusúa" was the form used by the Christians in Arabia before the time of Mahammed. This argument loses much of its force when we recollect that the Christians in Arabia at that time were generally adherents of one or other of the heretical parties that marred the beauty, and debased the character of the church; and that coincidence of opinion or practice with them, would neither prove the correctness of, nor give additional strength to, our opinions. Besides, their literature was not important, nor has it any perceptible bearing on that of India. If their literature had been early and extensively spread in India, and had been crowded out by that of the Mahammadans, but was still found deeply mixed up with the early and existing literature of the country, then would this argument have a vastly more important bearing than it now has.

5th. The desire to make the Heb. name of the Redeemer the "band of brotherhood throughout the world" has something in it very pretty, very grateful to every Christian heart. But when it can be had only at the expense of breaking up the established usages of centuries, without any positive or real gain, we pause before we consent to the sacrifice.

6th. The grand, controling objection which we have to the change of this name is, that the term "Isá" already pervades the whole structure of Mahammedan and Christian literature, and cannot be eradicated. The new literature, published after the change, would not correspond with the old; and while one would speak of "Isá" the other would speak of "Yusúa" and thousands would fail to perceive the identity. Thus the whole extent of literature, both Mahammadan and Christian, would have to be forced into a state of premature obsoleteness. This, though it might be done with regard to the Christian, through the power of the Press and the inherent energy of the Christian character, still the old and venerated Mahammadan works, which are chiefly in M. S. are not so likely to be replaced by new ones in which Isá will be changed to "Yusúa" merely to accommodate Christians. Here the contemplated change will throw a most deep and lingering embarassment around the comparison of new and old books, and also around the whole controversy between Christians and Mahammadans.

7th. But another and still more embarassing difficulty is, that the term "Isái" or "Isawi" by which Christians are all called, is as extensively prevalent, and as thoroughly diffused through the whole of Mahommedan and Christian literature, as Isá itself. And if the foundation be dug up, the structure raised upon it must also go with it. If the name itself be changed, then the epithet by which Christians are known throughout the whole Mahommedan world, must be changed with it; and a new epithet compounded of Yusúa in some of its forms be adopted in its stead. And it will require no small effort to teach even ourselves to adopt this new designation, and introduce it into all our conversation and religious exercises. And how much more difficult to teach Asiatic nations to do the same?

8th. If we should now attempt this change, the impression would go extensively abroad among Mahommedans and others, that we have just now found out what the name of our Saviour is—that we have been hitherto in error on that subject. And if we have been labouring amongst them for more than 30 years, and have never found out till now what is the true name of Him whom we preach, what security is there that after another half century we will not find out that this also is an error. True this is a difficulty that may be surmounted. But we need to be pretty well assured of an end to be gained worthy of the sacrifice, to nerve our minds for the effort.

9th. The form of letters to be adopted may be, in the native characters, read either Yisú, Yisúa, Yasúa, and Yusúa. The latter, according to analogy of language, would be the regular form. But there is nothing in the form of the letters themselves to direct as to which of these forms should be used. Whereas in the current from Isá, there is no danger of mispronunciation. We would not, however, be strenuous about what precise form or order of letters be used, provided the established pronunciation "Isá" be not changed.

10th. The term عيسى may or may not have been "before us for the last five years," as the Com. state. If it has, then from the fact of its being pronounced Isá, not affecting the sound in any perceptible degree, it elicited no attention beyond the single individual who may have advocated it in some of the periodicals.

11th. That the Baptist Missionaries, the Translation Society, &c. have adopted Yusúa, and circulated large editions in these Provinces, &c.

*We omit the Arabic and Hebrew letters, as the whole force of the question can be seen in the Roman letters.

tually accepted the post of Poet Laureate, in consequence of communications from Sir Robert Peel and the Lord Chamberlain.

— The Hurkaru informs us that Mr. G. W. Johnson, formerly assistant Editor of the Englishman, and lately sole Editor of the Courier, is on the eve of publishing a book, styled "Three years in Calcutta." It will comprize, it is said, much information relative to the late administration of Lord Auckland.

— A volume of Reports of cases adjudged by the Sudder Court, from 1830 to 1834, has just been published by Mr. Sutherland, Secretary to the Law Commission. We have not seen the work, but the Hurkaru hints, that it is disfigured by an attempt to write native names according to the Romanized system. If this plan has been adopted, the value of the work will have been not a little diminished.

MONDAY, MAY 29.

— A Delhi Gazette Extra of the 16th May, just received, created a hope that it might announce another triumph of Sir Charles Napier, as the Beloochees were known to have collected in large numbers in the vicinity of Hydrabad; but it contained no other intelligence than that of a panic into which the Military authorities at Subathoo had been thrown by an idle rumour, that the Lahore Government had instigated the Hill tribes to rise and cut off three European Regiments in the Hills. It was also added that 15,000 men were to assemble immediately and expel us.

— The City Article of the Hurkaru states, that the last Mail brought 15 lakhs of Rupees on account of the merchants from England. It was stated in the Overland Mail, that Government intended to discontinue the advances on shipments in this country, and to draw the requisite funds from India by Bills given in London on the local authorities to the extent of more than two millions sterling. The Hurkaru says, that there is some expectation that the next Mail will bring orders to pay the Opium indemnity here, but the amount of compensation had not been settled when the Mail left, and there is apparently a difference of more than a million sterling between the demand of the merchants, and the concession of the Ministry.

— The latest intelligence from Scinde is to the 8th of May from Kerachee. H. M. 28th had left that place for Hydrabad, but the regiment had been severely visited with sickness since its arrival in Scinde. More than a hundred were in hospital, and they were dying at the rate of two or three in a day. It is said that Shere Mahomed has sent a message to General Napier to say, that as they had fought two battles for their country, he wished one more battle for religion. The reply was, that he should come on, and that as soon as he was near enough to Hydrabad he should have enough of fighting.

TUESDAY, MAY 30.

— The Star states that the Governor General is actually on his return to Calcutta. It is said that his Lordship somewhat suddenly declared his intention of coming down to Allahabad with the whole of his civil and military suite.

— The discussion regarding the Lottery of Methold and Co. has ceased, by their continued refusal of the name of the individual to whom the largest prize fell. The publication of the number, which came up with the rich prize will not satisfy the public. Suspicion is abroad that the Minor Lotteries are not conducted with that fairness which marked the Government Lotteries, and these suspicions can be removed only by the distinct publication of the names of the winners. The refusal of the names will at once turn public suspicions into certainty.

— The number of letters and covers despatched by the Steamer Cleopatra from Bombay to London, as well as the number received by the Victoria, from Europe, is thus given in the Bombay papers.

Memorandum of the number of Covers received by the Steamer Victoria, on the 14th April, 1843.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31.

— No farther particulars have been received respecting the rumoured rising of the Hill tribes at Subathoo, to drive us back into the plains; and there can be little doubt of its being a false alarm. General Sir John McCaskill however has taken every precaution against surprize. That the Hill men are not over pleased with the location of three beef eating Regiments of Europeans among their flocks and herds, may be easily understood; but that Shere Singh should mix himself up in a conspiracy against the English, and thus endanger his crown, which is ricketty enough already, is—less credible than the promised visit of the Aerial.

— Lord Ellenborough, according to the common voice of the public press, comes down immediately to Calcutta. His Lordship travels by dawk to Allahabad, where he takes steam, and moves down to the city of Palaces. Mr. G. Clerk, "unquestionably the ablest man in the North Western Provinces," will be appointed Governor of Agra so long as that office lasts.

— The Star states, that the statue of the Marquis of Wellesley recently brought out in the Justina, is the gift of the Court of Directors. The money publicly subscribed by the community in India for the statue, never reached its destination; why, our contemporary does not explain. Of course we are at full liberty to suspect that there was foul play. The statue remained in the Studio of Chantry unredeemed. That eminent Sculptor died about the same time as the eminent Statesman, and the Court of Directors immediately purchased the statue from his executors, and have handsomely presented it to the city of Calcutta.

— The Englishman states, that the Barometer at 6 P. M. yesterday was far below the average of last year, just before the terrific gale. The Master Attendant sent round a Circular to all the ships in the river to prepare for foul weather. A Northwester began up here about ½ past seven, lulled after half past eight, and commenced again at half past twelve, a little after midnight. The lightning and thunder were terrific, and for ten minutes it blew as violently at any period of last year's gale.

— The Englishman announces the appearance of Mr. Stocqueler's Memorials of the War in Affghanistan, from October 1838 to November 1842. We hope to receive our own copy before our next issue, and shall then be enabled to review it.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

BHAUGULPORE BRANCH AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Pursuant to Resolution No. 6 of the Society's Proceedings, dated the 11th of April last, the first show of Flowers, Fruits, and Vegetables took place this 10th day of May 1843, at Cleveland House.

The attendance of both European and Native Gentlemen was most numerous, indeed the Show Room was quite crowded and was honoured with the presence of the Ladies of the station.

The Floricultural Department contained many rare specimens of the beauties of Flora, and the very healthy appearance of the flowers indicated the superiority of the Bhaugulpore climate even in the month of May.

In the Fruit Department there were some very fine Peaches, Leechees, Alloo Bokharas, Plantains, &c. Some of the Peaches weighed 14 Rupees each. In the Vegetable Department the most conspicuous specimen was a bundle of Asparagus of unusual size from the garden of P. Onraet, Esq. Finer was never seen in Calcutta or even England.

Some new Potatoes from Madras seed of very good size, from the garden of G. F. Brown, Esq. excited much attention from the circumstance of the seed having been planted in February as an experiment, and the fruit gathered in May, thus proving that two crops of Potatoes can be raised in one year.

A third crop is now expected from seed planted in April, the plant being now healthy in appearance. Beet root and Celery were next looked at, and both were of full size and in the finest order. A basket of Cucumbers from the garden of J. Glas, Esq. was remarkable for the size, color, and fresh appearance of the fruit. Some Carrots (grown from English seed) from the garden of Captain Dore, were exceedingly fine, both in color and size. There were some very fine Leeks from the garden of J. Pontet, Esq.

Several dallees from the gardens of Native Gentlemen contained some very good samples of vegetables and fruit, and from the improvements their gardens are undergoing it is supposed the competition at our next show on the 1st of November, will be very great and exciting. The Prizes described in the appended List were then awarded by the Judges.

A sample of Clover reared from Cabul seed by Baboo Gooroo Churn Mitter, looked very healthy and had the blossom on it.

Since the last report of our Proceedings, 12½ biggahs of excellent ground (Lakaraj) in a beautiful situation, have been purchased and much progress in fashioning and laying out the garden has been made.

The name of Baboo Gooroo Churn Mitter as a Donor and Monthly Subscriber was inadvertently omitted in our last report: he is a most intelligent and zealous member of the institution. The Society has to accord its best acknowledgments for the following Donations.

To J. Glas, Esq. for a valuable collection of Cotton seeds, viz. Mexican, Sea Island, Seychelles, together with samples of the Cotton.

To R. F. Hodgson, Esq. Magistrate of Monghyr, for a fine Cape Oak plant.

To Walter Landale, Esq. for some very fine Bamboos, for making a Chevaux de frise for the Garden Hedge.

To C. C. Bruce, Esq. for a pair of handsome China Garden Seats.

To A. Johnson, Esq. for a bottle of very superior Arrow Root, the produce of his (the Lal Bagh) garden.

For the above very liberal Donations and the continued increase of Monthly Subscribers, the Society return their united sincere thanks and best acknowledgments.

The Society has determined upon giving proper attention to the Agricultural Department, and as the produce of the present harvest is very indifferent both in the size and quantity of the Grain, it is quite clear that an importation of good Seed would prove highly beneficial to the district. Potatoes and Garden seeds will be largely distributed, a change of seed of the former very much wanted.

Prizes for Cotton, Sugar Cane, Oats, Wheat, Barley, Peas, and the like, will be given in due season. A Cattle show for Bullocks, Cows, Sheep, &c. the produce of the Bhaugulpore and neighbouring districts is under consideration.

A public market is about to be established near the public garden and it is believed that Grain, Vegetables, Fruits, &c. will be brought for sale in large quantities.

Thus the price of grain and other commodities will, it is hoped, soon become cheaper, and gradually descend to that reasonable price at which it was disposed of two years ago when no great monopoly existed. This plan has been explained to several Natives, and it is their opinion that it will not only work well, but that we shall be able eventually to have two market days a week.

By order of the Society.

CALCUTTA THE AUXILIARY BIBLE SOCIETY.

To the Committee of the Society, in

Dear Brethren in Christ,

We have been informed that the Com. of the Cal. Aux. Bible Society have laid before you a printed Overture requesting your approbation and co-operation in their Resolution to change the sacred name of our Saviour from "Isá" to "Yusúa" in the translations of the scriptures hereafter to be printed in the Urdu dialect. We feel solicitous that you should be in possession of all available information when you come to the decision of a question so important in its bearings.

We come not before you as the "accusers of our Brethren" in Calcutta; but under the impression that our Brethren in Calcutta; from their Geographical position, and other incidental causes, were not, at the time of issuing their Minute, as fully in possession of the views and information of those most directly and deeply concerned in this change, as it were desirable to be, previous to pushing a question of such importance to its final issue.

As the translations of the scriptures affected by the contemplated change are chiefly used in N. India, and comparatively little used in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, we feel that we who live and labour in this part of India are peculiarly interested in the change.

Some 6 or 8 months ago the Cal. Com. sent out a printed Circular, to a large number of Missionaries in N. India, containing a specimen sheet of the system in which they contemplated hereafter printing scripture Proper Names. Among these was the name of our Saviour. But as it was there spelled "Yisu" a form recently adopted, and very unacceptable to most of those concerned in the practical application of it, and not at all likely ever to come into current use, it was not thought advisable to wound the feelings of those who had introduced the term, and was therefore passed over with a simple expression of disapprobation. But had the Missionaries been aware of the position about to be taken by the Com. they would generally have given a much more decided reply. The Com. have made the return thus inadvertently given, the basis of their contemplated change.

We will notice the prominent reasons given in the minute of the Cal. Com. as briefly as we can.

1st. That in the term "Isa"* the order of the Hebrew letters is inverted, and the meaning of the name sacrificed. This argument will have force only with those who have some familiarity with the Hebrew Grammar, which perhaps not one in ten thousand Hindoos and Mahomedans has. Again, it is not a matter of high importance whether the letters forming the name have any definite meaning in themselves or not. The first time the name is introduced into the New Testament, viz. Matt. 1. 21. it is announced—"thou shalt call his name Jesus, because he shall save his people from their sins." This distinctly defines the name, and sufficiently for all practical purposes, whether it be represented by the letters Isa, Yisú, Yusúa or Yushua. And as it is admitted that the letters forming the name of Isá have no other meaning, why not allow the definition given by the Angel to be sufficient. The fact that Yusua and Yashua and Yahashua were interchangeable names in Heb. and this name common to many others besides our blessed Saviour, shows that the point of high importance was not the inherent power, or order of the letters of the name, but the attributes and character of the person wearing the name.

2nd. The argument drawn from the practice of Martyn, &c. From the perusal of the translations of Martyn and Thomason it seems that they sought out with care and discrimination the popular, generally understood terms used to designate scripture names, and used them without hesitation, leaving the philological question to be settled or not afterwards as circumstances might dictate. Thus no argument can be fairly drawn on either side from the practice of those dear departed men.

3rd. That Mahammed intentionally corrupted the name of the Saviour with a view to obscure his glory and depreciate his character. Of this there appears no direct or satisfactory evidence. And even if the assumption be true, still the question has long time ceased to be one of real importance. There is the same, nay stronger reason to believe that the term "Christian" was at first opprobriously given at Antioch, and in the surrounding countries. But the term has long since ceased to carry with it any ignominious force. And no one feels the least apprehension of evil from the continued use of it. It is an attribute of goodness to live down and neutralize the force of any calumnious or invidious epithets that may be heaped upon it. Thus whatever may have been the design of introducing the term "Isá" at first, it has long since ceased to have any other force than as a designation of Him who came to "save his people from their sins." And it has acquired by the uninterrupted usage of 12 centuries, a sacredness little short of that of Yusua in Hebrew, and has become so completely entwined around every fibre of Mahommadan and Christian Literature in India, that it seems like doing them a common injury to wrest it from them. And the idea of restoration of the primitive form of the name, loses almost all its force in Hindoostan, where the primitive term never had an existence.

4th. That "Yusúa" was the form used by the Christians in Arabia before the time of Mahammed. This argument loses much of its force when we recollect that the Christians in Arabia at that time were generally adherents of one or other of the heretical parties that marred the beauty, and debased the character of the church; and that coincidence of opinion or practice with them, would neither prove the correctness of, nor give additional strength to, our opinions. Besides, their literature was not important, nor has it any perceptible bearing on that of India. If their literature had been early and extensively spread in India, and had been crowded out by that of the Mahammadans, but was still found deeply mixed up with the early and existing literature of the country, then would this argument have a vastly more important bearing than it now has.

5th. The desire to make the Heb. name of the Redeemer the "band of brotherhood throughout the world" has something in it very pretty, very grateful to every Christian heart. But when it can be had only at the expense of breaking up the established usages of centuries, without any positive or real gain, we pause before we consent to the sacrifice.

6th. The grand, controling objection which we have to the change of this name is, that the term "Isa" already pervades the whole structure of Mahammedan and Christian literature, and cannot be eradicated. The new literature, published after the change, would not correspond with the old; and while one would speak of "Isá" the other would speak of "Yusúa" and thousands would fail to perceive the identity. Thus the whole extent of literature, both Mahammadan and Christian, would have to be forced into a state of premature obsoleteness. This, though it might be done with regard to the Christian, through the power of the Press and the inherent energy of the Christian character, still the old and venerated Mahammadan works, which are chiefly in M. S. are not so likely to be replaced by new ones in which Isá will be changed to "Yusúa" merely to accommodate Christians. Here the contemplated change will throw a most deep and lingering embarassment around the comparison of new and old books, and also around the whole controversy between Christians and Mahammadans.

7th. But another and still more embarassing difficulty is, that the term "Isái" or "Isawi" by which Christians are all called, is as extensively prevalent, and as thoroughly diffused through the whole of Mahommedan and Christian literature, as Isá itself. And if the foundation be dug up, the structure raised upon it must also go with it. If the name itself be changed, then the epithet by which Christians are known throughout the whole Mahommedan world, must be changed with it; and a new epithet compounded of Yusúa in some of its forms be adopted in its stead. And it will require no small effort to teach even ourselves to adopt this new designation, and introduce it into all our converation and religious exercises. And how much more difficult to teach Asiatic nations to do the same?

8th. If we should now attempt this change, the impression would go extensively abroad among Mahommedans and others, that we have just now found out what the name of our Saviour is—that we have been hitherto in error on that subject. And if we have been labouring amongst them for more than 30 years, and have never found out till now what is the true name of Him whom we preach, what security is there that after another half century we will not find out that this also is an error. True this is a difficulty that may be surmounted. But we need to be pretty well assured of an end to be gained worthy of the sacrifice, to nerve our minds for the effort.

9th. The form of letters to be adopted may be, in the native characters, read either Yisú, Yisúa, Yasúa, and Yusúa. The latter, according to analogy of language, would be the regular form. But there is nothing in the form of the letters themselves to direct as to which of these forms should be used. Whereas in the current from Isá, there is no danger of mispronunciation. We would not, however, be strenuous about what precise form or order of letters be used, provided the established pronunciation "Isá" be not changed.

10th. The term يسوع may or may not have been "before us for the last five years," as the Com. state. If it has, then from the fact of its being pronounced Isá, not affecting the sound in any perceptible degree, it elicited no attention beyond the single individual who may have advocated it in some of the periodicals.

11th. That the Baptist Missionaries, the Translation Society, &c. have adopted Yusúa, and circulated large editions in these Provinces, &c.

*We omit the Arabic and Hebrew letters, as the whole force of the question can be seen in the Roman letters.

—Very few of us were aware at all that the Translation Society had adopted the term. Besides it publishes and circulates on so small a scale that it might be long before it would be known what system it adopts, were not something of this kind to draw it out. As to the Baptist Missionaries, it was known that they had adopted the form Yusúa; but as their versions were circulated only by the members of one communion, and as it was thought even theirs only indicated the fondness of an individual or two for European sounds, a reluctance unnecessarily to wound the feelings, or to seem unnecessarily severe, restrained us from any public notice of the fact. Besides, the only effect that the introduction of the new form has had, was a little stumbling on the part of the native reader, when he first met the form Yusúa until he found that it was intended for "Isá;" then he went on and pronounced it Isá. And we have not heard of more than one or two, either European or Native, who in common usage read it any other way than Isá, although written Yusúa." Thus we are not aware that the 25, or 30,000 copies of the Baptist translations circulated in these provinces, have made the slightest advance towards giving currency to the term Yusúa.

Thus have we briefly presented the prominent objections which we have to the proposed change. But, few, and brief as they are, they vastly outweigh, in our minds, every possible advantage that can accrue from the change. Whether he be called Isá or Yusúa, or Yáhashúa the Bible informs us he shall be so called, "because he shall save his people from their sins;" and all experience tells us that his love and grace are as efficacious under the term "Isá" as that of Jesus, or Yusúa. True, the original term would be more grateful to every Christian heart, provided it could be had without too great a sacrifice. But is the difference of the mere order of the letters equal to the sacrifices and hazards involved in the attempt to redress a grievance of 12 centuries standing, long after that grievance has ceased to be felt?

We regret that the Cal. Com. carried the question out of India, at least until they had learned what objections to their plan were felt by those most concerned in its statement, and how near we could come to a satisfactory adjustment of it in India. But as they have appealed to the Societies at home, we can only lay our reasons for not wishing the change, before the same societies, and trust that the sober, cautious wisdom at home will operate as a check upon the undue precipitancy, or undue reluctance of either party here, and that the Lord will direct the whole matter into that course which will be acceptable to Him, and in the end advance his own glory.

With sentiments of highest esteem and confidence we sign ourselves your Brethren in the Lord,

The Press was unanimous on the propriety if Government discontinuing the Calcutta lottery, but the Press continued to advertise minor ones. We thought this inconsistent, considering the grounds upon which they were disapproved and we were much inclined no close our columns against them. We spoke on the subject to two or three friends who thought differently from us, and that if a public journal expressed its opinions it was not bound to make any pecuniary sacrifice in carrying them out. The subject entirely passed from our mind until the appearance of some letters in the Englishman calling upon Messrs. Methold and Co. for the names of the parties who had drawn certain prizes. There was something in these letters that induced us to watch for the reply. To us it was not satisfactory; it declined all information, on the ground that the letters were anonymous, and why they should not have been we do not know, as they asked for no other information than the public is usually put in possession of by well regulated offices without any application at all. But Methold and Co., declared that if any party wrote under his proper signature he should be answered; they were obliged, and the required information was not forthcoming. Under these circumstances we gave orders that not another advertisement of their lotteries should appear in our paper. We have had applications from the Mofussil on the subject of these schemes and were unable to answer them, but to continue giving them publicity when the parties themselves refuse to name the winners of the best prizes, and when it is plainly stated that they have fallen to their own share, is what we do not think consistent with the duty we owe our subscribers, to say nothing of the great public wrong we should be encouraging supposing these lotteries not to be what they are represented. Our readers will perhaps remember some grand speculative schemes, lotteries and what not, by one Thomas Wiltshire and Co. What has become of them? Was there ever a drawing? Where is the projector? There was hardly a paper in India that did not advertise for Thomas Wiltshire and Co. How much is owing on that account? Our loss we suspect is comparatively small for we declined the honour after one month.—Cal. Star, May 26.

We refused peremptorily to advertize his lotteries; but for the other advertisements we lost to the matter of 200 Rs. Never was the press so thoroughly victimized—this is not an actionable term we hope—as by these advertisements. They were sent to every paper in India, they were published at Hong Kong; and we should not be surprized to find them in the next number of the Hawaiian journal.—Editor Friend of India.

We copy the following account of the drawings first mentioned, from the Naval and Military Gazette of the 1st ultimo:—

"Indian Character, Costume, Scenery, &c.—Selections from the sketch-book of the Hon. Miss Eden sister of the late Governor General of India, are just now on private view, by ticket, at Messrs. Dickenson and Son's, in Bond-street, with a view to their publication. We have twice had the pleasure of inspecting these beautiful efforts of the pencil, than which we are aware of nothing finer in the department of watercolour painting. The sketches, we are told, were made during Miss Eden's residence at the seat of Government in India; and they embrace subjects chosen not only in Calcutta, but also in the northern provinces of Bengal. The most interesting specimens will probably be considered the portraits of the Indian Princes, their Officers, chief Attendants, &c., who respectively sat to the fair artist. Conspicuously amongst them are distinguished, Dost Mahomed two of his sons, and his nephew (Mahomed Akbar Khan, Hyde Khan, and Ghuznee Khan); Runjeet Singh, the old Lion of Lahore; Maharajah Shere Singh, the present ruler of the Punjab—and a most villanous-looking fellow he is; Purtab Singh, his son and heir apparent; and Heera Singh, the son of Dhyan Singh, prime minister of the Punjab. There are also various portraits and studies of Military and Civil Officers, native troops, akalees, faqueers, &c.; besides sketches of architecture, scenery, elephants, camels, cheetas, and other animals. These drawings (especially the portraits) are remarkable for their variety, force, and individuality of character—for their composition and arrangement—for their exquisite harmony of colour—and, altogether, for the artist-like spirit with which they are executed. Perhaps there is no other collection of similar extent that conveys so strong and accurate an idea of Indian character and costume. Some of the drawings have been already transferred to stone, and others are in progress, by Mr. Lowes Dickinson. They are amongst the finest specimens we have seen of tinted lithography, requiring nothing but colour to render them equally effective as the originals. A few copies are, we understand, to be coloured as exact fac similes."

LATEST INTELLIGENCE FROM EGYPT.

"I am sorry I have no news of interest to send you—it is the old story over again—bad times—no trade—no money, no credit! except to the Pacha who never pays, he takes every thing at his own price and then upon tick. The old Gent. has been during the last month in the Delta superintending his farms—he is now about to visit Alexandria. The new Transit Company have been actively employed in increasing the means of accommodation across the desert, they have purchased many horses and are building 20 more carriages, and I hear intend enlarging the station houses in the desert. If they do not make the route as complete as it can be made no other parties can as they are assisted by the Pacha, who has ordered their interests to be attended to even before his own, he has given them stabling, janessaries, and indeed has done every thing they have asked him, yet notwithstanding their powerful position they are not without opposition. Mr. Pothonier, late manager at Alexandria of Hill and Co.'s interests, has placed tents and carriages between this and Suez and intends to try fortune, and as he is a very clever active fellow, will, even if he does not succeed, do an immense injury to the East India Company. The Oriental and Peninsular Company have their horses and carriages here—and on dit intend to run them next month. Opposition in this country is far from a public benefit, and must increase the price and difficulties of the Transit.

Prince Albert, brother of the King of Russia, who went up the Nile to Thebes, has returned, and after visiting the Pyramids started endromedaire to Mount Sinai and Jerusalem—while he was here the Prussian Mission under Dr. Lepsius, carrying on excavations at Saccarah—were robbed by some Bedouins and one of the party was severely wounded—the Sheiks of the villages of Sacarrah and Abousur have been flogged, and villages laid under contribution for the value of the stolen property—said to be worth about 22 purses of £5 each.—Calcutta Star.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—The word saheb in Persian, I believe, means no more than what is understood by that of "gentleman," or "Mr." or "Esquire" in English, and of "Baboo" or "Mahásoy" in Bengalee. It is invariably applied to Christians, or Topee walahs and Mahomedans. Sometimes a Hindoo also is, out of over etiquette, styled both Baboo and Saheb, as "Baboo-saheb."

Again, the term Saheb, when used alone without any name being prefixed to it, is always meant to convey the idea of a Christian, wearing "a round hat with a brim to it;" and whenever his name happens to be pronounced, the word Saheb must be added to it, more from an idea of discrimination than that of courtesy: to call him without it, sounds harsh and dissonant to the ears of auditory. Hence I am at a loss to conjecture, why does the Judge wish to restrict the use of it to the covenanted branch of the service.*

From a view of every bearing of the case, I cannot but consider it fair, just, and reasonable to allow the Moonsiff the use of the term Saheb in his proceedings. In corroboration of my assertion, I would state that Mr. J. N. Thomas, Sudder Ameen of this Zillah, an East Indian by birth, was always addressed as Saheb, when he was Moonsiff of Salkhea, Singia and Sig-lly successively. Whether any of the Mahomedan Moonsiffs use it or not, I cannot exactly say; but of this I am sure, that if they ever do, Mr. Bentall would never take any umbrage or exception to it. The Hindoo Moonsiffs, from a feeling of modesty, have never ventured to use either the word Baboo or Saheb in their proceedings.

In fine, to have the question at once settled, and that an uniformity be preserved in the proceedings of all Moonsiffs, it is desirable that the superior

* We have since the publication of our article heard a different version of the dispute between the Moonsiff and the Judge, which places it altogether in a different light. We hope to be able to publish it one of these days.—Ed.

Court would be pleased to issue out a Circular to this effect, that the Christian and Mahomedan Moonsiffs are to use the term Saheb, and the Hindoo ones that of Baboo, in their proceedings; and the Judges and other officers also in their communication with them to adopt the same style.

I am, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
Jessore, May 26, 1843. A READER.

We did not like to reject this letter; and we have therefore pruned it of some of the flowers of eloquence, which the Chuckerbuttees have recently offered to the public.—Ed.

OBSTRUCTIONS TO NAVIGATION.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Although I cannot assume the title of a "constant reader" of your paper, I yet see enough of it to be well aware that you are unwearied in your efforts to expose and suggest remedies for grievances affecting the interests of India, and I believe the particular one which is at present uppermost in my mind has already been the occasional subject of your pen. I allude to Inland Navigation in this country, the defects in which, whether from natural or artificial causes, are such as to lead to an enormous annual loss of both property and life, to an extent which would startle any one who should have the industry to collect its statistical details.

The natural causes which at certain seasons of the year render the Navigation of the different rivers dangerous and in some instances impracticable, may possibly be invincible by human skill. Of this I cannot profess to be a judge, but I should like much to see this invincibility put to the proof, by the first rate engineering talent of India being set in opposition to it.

I see a regular report in the newspapers from an Engineer officer of the depth of water at various points of the rivers, and I presume efforts are simultaneously made under his supervision, to decrease the number of shallows and sand banks, and to remove the obstructions which may have caused them. Of the extent of such efforts I must plead ignorance, the fact being that constant occupation within the Ditch prevents my having much knowledge of what is going on in the rivers; but if I may judge of that extent by the harassing detention sustained by boats in the Bhagarutty between Jungypore, Nuddeah and Cutwa, and the heavy expense incurred in assisting them over shallow portions of that river, I may be allowed to vote those efforts exceedingly inadequate to the purpose.

The artificial causes of a scanty supply of water, if I have been correctly informed upon the subject, exhibit a new illustration of the trite adage touching Peter and Paul's respective possessions. In a letter which lately appeared in the Hurkaru, it was stated that the navigation of the Jumna had been much impeded by a bund being thrown across it for the purpose of procuring a supply of water to the Delhi Canals, and that the same system was hereafter to be adopted in furnishing water from the Ganges to the Canals now in course of construction.

If this be the case, the latter river can scarcely fail to be most seriously injured, if not entirely stopped during the dry season; and the disadvantages of such an event would, I think, far outweigh the benefits which these canals confer on other parts of India. In a time of famine, especially the benefit of easy importation of grain into the Upper Provinces, would be incalculably beyond that of having the canals in running order.

I believe it was once pointed out to Lord Auckland, that the Jumna had been bunded to supply the Canals, but his reply was, "impossible, you must have been misinformed."

In conclusion, let me entreat you to call upon the powers that be, to exert themselves in the improvement of the channel of these "shallow rivers by whose falls" so much property is annually wasted. It is a measure of vital importance to the interest of India, and one of which the imperious necessity is more and more apparent as each successive dry season returns upon us.*

I am, faithfully yours,
A CALCUTTA MERCHANT,
Who has suffered losses by river navigation.
26th May, 1843.

* We have omitted the last paragraph, which added nothing to the strength of the argument. The papers say his Lordship is coming down to reside, near his Council; and there can be no doubt that the improvement of internal navigation will be among the first objects of his attention.—Ed.

THE OPPOSITION TO THE GOVERNMENT EDUCATION SCHEME.—The opposition to this infamous measure proceeds in the most gratifying manner. We ourselves are inundated with letters, nearly all of which are accounts of meetings held or about to be held for the purpose of denouncing the odious project. Petitions against it are already pouring into the House of Commons by hundreds; and the universal cry is, Away with the Education Clauses! The most moderate opponents of the measure have been forced to regard it as perfectly incurable by alteration, and join in the demand for its complete rejection. The Rev. J. H. HINTON has published a small tract, in which seven main objections to the Bill are very clearly and forcibly put. In a pamphlet entitled "The Bill or the Alternative," Mr. Henry Dunn has effectually deprived certain professed Liberals of their favourite plea; namely, that the alternative is, this measure or none; and has also succeeded in placing Ministers in direct opposition to themselves on the subject of Education. The Rev. W. Thorn, also, has issued "Twenty Reasons" against the Bill, stated with his usual point and pungency. Other pamphlets are announced as forthcoming. A Committee for conference, including opponents of the Bill of all denominations, has been appointed; and we are warranted in assuring our friends in the country, that no means will be left untried of rousing the whole kingdom, to its obscurest and remotest corners, against this barefaced attempt to annihilate our Civil and Religious Liberties. The universal call for a great public meeting in London will very speedily be obeyed. Meantime, the Sunday-school Auxiliary Unions are holding meetings in every quarter of the Metropolis. The South London met last night in the Borough-road Chapel, and nearly a thousand persons signed the Petition before leaving the place. To-night, the East London meets at the Eastern Institution in Commercial-road, and the North London in Jewin-street Chapel to-morrow. The place of meeting of the West London has not yet been determined on. But the Parent Committee have called a meeting of the entire Sunday-school Union for Wednesday next, at Finsbury Chapel; Exeter Hall being unfortunately pre-occupied for the whole of April and May.—Pat.

THE WESLEYANS AND THE EDUCATION SCHEME.—Another week's serious consideration of the Factories Bill has confirmed us yet more strongly in the conviction, which we expressed in our last, of its tremendously injurious character and tendency. It would be scarcely possible to devise enactments calculated to inflict a larger amount of evil on the educational movements of Wesleyans and Dissenters than those which constitute the distinctive features of this measure. Not even Lord Sidmouth's celebrated bill called for a more vigorous and extended exertion of every power of opposition which can be consistently and properly employed. The adoption of this measure as it now stands, would unquestionably be the greatest calamity that has ever befallen our connexion, and would inflict a lamentable wound on Civil and Religious Liberty in general. It is to be hoped, however, that even yet it may be possible to secure either the withdrawal of the bill, or the modification in various important particulars of its educational clauses;—but, whatever be the result, it is a clear duty to the Church of Christ and the country at large to leave no prudent and Christian means untried, in order to prevent those clauses becoming the law of the land.

A large meeting of the United Committees (Privileges and Education) assembled yesterday for farther deliberation on this momentous matter. A considerable number of ministers and lay gentlemen, specially from the manufacturing districts, were present. Probably there never was a more completely unanimous expression of opinion on any subject than was heard from all sides in denunciation of this bill; the only diversity seemed to be in the greater strength and earnestness with which that denunciation was uttered by the individuals who had most closely studied its true character, or who, from living in the localities on which it particularly bears, were especially alive to the evils it is calculated to produce. Lengthened and deliberate consultation was held as to the best mode of conducting that opposition which all felt to be urgently necessary,—and an adjournment of the meeting till Thursday took place, in order to afford time for such arrangements and preparations as are adapted to the emergency. In this posture of affairs, we refrain from writing as copiously on the subject as we had proposed, until the steps which the Committees decide on shall be made public. In the mean time, we renew our assurance to our readers, that everything connected with the measure is watched over by the men in whom the Wesleyan body reposes the largest confidence, with an intense solicitude suited to the urgent and vital importance of the interests involved.—Watchman.

FRENCH AGGRESSION ON PROTESTANT MISSIONS.—"We have, Heaven knows," says the Times, "Colonies enough in all quarters of the Globe; and it would hardly become a nation that owns a province in every sea, and on every continent, to fall a squabbling with France about a petty kitchen-garden in the Pacific." Such is the plea set up by the enemies to Protestant Missions for conniving at the surrender of the Polynesian Archipelago to the demoralising influence of French licentiousness and Romish superstition. Whether we have Colonies enough, or more than enough, is, however, not the question, since there is no room for colonization in those islands. A French Colony in a kitchen-garden were an absurdity; and the Times insults the French nation by the supposition, that they aim at "acquiring new Colonies" in the Pacific, when all that they talk of, is securing naval stations. If, fifty years ago, it had pleased France to seize upon the whole archipelago, as the theatre of an experiment upon its cannibal population, nothing, perhaps, would have been said against it. But the entire value of the islands has been created by the civilization introduced by British Missionaries; and it is of these fruits of civilization that France now claims to appropriate to herself the benefit, while seeking to displace the labourers to whom Tahiti owes her laws, her schools, her written language, her commerce, by priests of another creed and another tongue, whose only errand and object are, to destroy the puritanism which has succeeded to heathen profligacy, and substitute the domination of Rome for the kingdom of Christ.

The Times may think, "it will be time enough to sound the Whig tocsin of Gallican alarm, when we discover that the French Ministers are unable or unwilling to keep their compact with this country." The Times may talk of treating with contempt any imputation upon "the honour of M. Guizot." The Times may say anything, presuming upon the ignorance of the majority of its readers, and the success of sheer effrontery. Unhappily, however, the "honour of M. Guizot" has been pawned long ago; for, when applied to on the occasion of a former outrage of the same kind, he distinctly disclaimed, on the part of his Government, any design to take possession of these islands, and pledged himself that no sanction should be given to the piratical exploits of the French Admiral. How scrupulous the French are in keeping their compacts with this country, does not remain to be discovered. The occupation of Algeria by France, in direct violation of an explicit compact, would of itself render it impossible to repose the slightest confidence in the vague and empty assurances of M. Guizot in the present instance. Our alarms, however, are not anti-Gallican, but anti-Papal. Apart from religious interests, we should not grudge France the fee-simple and absolute sovereignty of the whole groupe of "kitchen-gardens." And as to "squabbling with France," what we wish is, to prevent it in time, by now inducing the French Government, if possible, to desist from countenancing a perfidious scheme from which neither honour nor substantial advantage, in a national point of view, can possibly accrue, but which will inevitably lead to perilous squabbling, if persisted in, at no distant day.

We rejoice to observe that the Secretaries of the London and the Wesleyan Missionary Societies have jointly convened a meeting of the Friends of Protestant Missions, to be held at Exeter-hall on the 19th instant, for the purpose of adopting suitable measures, in consequence of the recent aggression of the French on the Island of Tahiti, and for securing the general interests of Protestant Missions in the Islands of the South Pacific.—Pat.

The united deputation from the London Missionary Society, and the Wesleyan Missionary Society, waited upon Sir R. Peel and the Earl of Aberdeen on Saturday at the Foreign-office, on the recent assumption of French sovereignty in the island of Tahiti, and the general interests of Protestant Christian missions in the islands of the South Seas. The deputation consisted of the Rev. Dr. Bunting, the Rev. Dr. Henderson, the Rev. Dr. Alder, the Rev. Dr. Morison, the Rev. John Scott, the Rev. E. Hoole, Mr. Thomas Farmer, Mr. Thomas M. Coombs, and the Rev. John Beecham, and the Rev. Arthur Tidman, Secretaries.—Record.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SOCIETY FOR PROPAGATING THE GOSPEL.—We think Mr. Kennaway's entire letter is based on an erroneous conception of the nature, and claims upon the Church, of the Society for Propagating the Gospel. It is nothing more than a Voluntary Association for this purpose, as is the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and the Church Missionary Society. The fact of all the Bishops of the Church giving their support at present to the two former Societies, and till recently, perhaps not half, or more than half, supporting the last, is an element in the question of a certain value, which every man of solid Christian perceptions will endeavour justly to appreciate. He will, however, not overvalue it, as Scripture and experience alike teach him, he may easily do. Neither the Propagation Society, nor that for Promoting Christian Knowledge, is indebted for its origin to Bishops. The existence of the former may be traced to the Honourable Robert Boyle, a man whose name is worthy of everlasting remembrance; and "the first Meeting of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge was held in London on Wednesday, the 8th of March, 1698-9, when the following persons were present:—The Right Hon. Lord Guildford, Sir Humphrey Markworth, Mr. Justice Hook, the Rev. Dr. Bray, and Col. Colchester." (Report, 1839, p. 19.) We understand that the support from bishops to the latter Society for a considerable number of years was very trifling. It was originated, and it urged its way onward without them—laymen, under God, being its main stay and succour. And now surely if to lay members of the Church it owed its very existence, it is unquestionably not only the privilege, but the duty alike of clerical and lay members to consider, whether it truly, in the present day, carries out its original intention of propagating the Gospel, and if it appears to them it does not, or does it in a questionable, corrupted, or perverted manner, no less surely is it their duty to lay before the Society their complaint, and if it is unattended to, to seek a purer channel of making Christ known to the world.—Record.

Puseyite Missionaries.—A person of the name of Badger was received into the Church Missionary Institution at Islington, from Malta, under the idea that he would prove a suitable missionary. It was discovered he was a Tractarian, and when about to be dismissed on this account by the Society, he was introduced to the Bishop of London, who forthwith received,* examined, and ordained him as a missionary to the Nestorians, one of the most interesting body of Christians in Asia, and who, under the instruction of Evangelical missionaries from America, are daily increasing in Christian knowledge, and all Christian excellence. Mr. Badger has been heard to boast, he will soon put an end to the unauthorized teaching of those sectaries. Now there is no mistake in this case. A man of sound Christian judgment, long resident at Malta, brought the particulars of the case under our notice, many months since, and the following is an extract of a letter from a gentleman, having no connexion with our other informant, dated at sea, off Sicily, Feb. 16th. He says, "I have been to Athens and Constantinople. I am sorry that the Bishop of London has sent a missionary to Mousel, the Rev. Mr. Badger, an ultra-Puseyite, opposed to tracts, schools, preaching, and hostile to the missionaries of other Churches." Our first informant, from personal knowledge, informed us of the character and sentiments of this person before his ordination; here, from an independent source of information, is a relation of his proceedings, in perfect harmony with the former account.

Our second case is the well-known one of Mr. Humphreys, a missionary of the Church Missionary Society at Madras. Upon distinct evidence being afforded the Committee that this gentleman had become a Tractarian, they intimated to him that his connexion with the Society must cease, as it was impossible they could apply the funds of a Society to propagate a heresy which it abhorred. It is well known that the Bishop of Madras objected to this decision; and since Mr. Humphreys has returned to this country, he has been presented with a chaplaincy to India, and, under the certificate of the Bishop of London as to his qualifications to preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, he is about to circulate Puseyism in India as a chaplain, which the Church Missionary Society had put an end to as a missionary.—Ibid.

Mr. Newman's Retraction.—There are some half-informed persons who have been disinclined to believe in Mr. Newman's adoption of Roman Catholic doctrines because of the strong language occasionally employed by him in reference to Rome. Mr. Newman not feeling it to be any longer necessary to employ this feint, has now given the following explanation of his reasons for having sometimes uttered denunciations of Rome:—"If you ask me how an individual could venture, not simply to hold, but to publish such views of a communion so ancient, so wide-spreading, so fruitful in saints, I answer that I said to myself, 'I am not speaking my own words; I am but following almost a concensus of the divines of my Church. They have ever used the strongest language against Rome, even the most able and learned of them. I wish to throw myself into their system. While I say what they say, I am safe. Such views, too, are necessary for our position.' Yet I have reason to fear still, that such language is to be ascribed, in no small measure, to an impetuous temper, a hope of approving myself to persons' respect, and a wish to repel the charge of Romanism. An admission of this kind involves no retraction of what I have written in defence of Anglican doctrine. And as I make it for personal reasons, I make it without consulting others. I am as fully convinced as ever, indeed I doubt not Roman Catholics themselves would confess that the Anglican doctrine is the strongest, nay, the only possible antagonist of their system. If Rome is to be withstood, it can be done in no other way."—Pat.

Dr. Candlish and the Nonintrusionists.—Dr. Candlish, who has just arrived in town, and who is well known as one of the Nonintrusion leaders in Scotland, delivered a discourse on Thursday evening in the Scots church, Riverterrace, Islington. The audience, which was very large, manifested the deepest attention to an address of nearly two hours' length. The design of the discourse was to explain the views of the Nonintrusion party, and to describe their present position and determination. Dr. Candlish stated that the number of ministers in the Nonintrusion party is about 500. Of these, he said, the greater part were preparing to leave their churches and manses in May next, in the event of the failure of Mr. Fox Maule's motion. The correspondence between the General Assembly and the Government gave no reason to hope that the appeal about to be made to the Commons would be successful, and the immediate withdrawal of this large number was therefore confidently expected. The preacher described in very affecting terms the sacrifices about to be made, and expressed a hope that, in the approaching hour of trial, those who had pledged themselves before God and the country would be ready, to go forth.—*Pat. Goodman's Fields, London.—The hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the original erection and opening of the place of worship belonging to the Seventh-day Baptists, or Sabbatarians, in Mill-yard, Goodman's field (which was one of the first-fruits of the Toleration Act) was commemorated on Friday last, March 31, when a lecture on the origin of the Seventh-day Baptists, the history of the Mill-yard congregation, and the lives of eminent members of that denomination of Baptists, was delivered in the afternoon, by the Rev. W. H. Black, the pastor of the church. In the evening, a sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Murch, of Stepney College, from Heb. iv. 9. Among the visitors attracted to this interesting commemoration of one of the most ancient Dissenting interests in the metropolis, we noticed the Revds. J. Howard Hinton, Joseph Belcher, D. D., Charles Stovel, J. C. Means, with G. Offer, Esq. (one of the trustees), Mr. Althans, Mr. Bugby, &c. The congregation at Mill-yard, with that in Eldon-street, Finsbury (Rev. J. B. Shenston's), are the only two remaining Sabbatarian congregations in London.—Ibid.

New-Zealand Mission.—The blessing of God continues to be vouchsafed, in a marked degree, to the labours of the missionaries and native teachers, and the circulation of the Scriptures almost throughout the Northern Island and in some parts of the Middle Island. Notwithstanding the unceasing efforts of the great adversary, and the temptations arising from Popery and worldliness, the Christian natives have, for the most part, been enabled to maintain the consistency of their character, and to advance in knowledge and grace. Fresh inroads have been made upon the dominion of Heathenism: and in all the districts considerable numbers have been added to the Church. To the Lord our God be all the praise! The arrival of the Bishop, and the accession of strength to the band of labourers in this part of the Lord's vineyard, by the addition of new missionaries, are also a cause for great thankfulness. And now that the outward frame work of the Christian Church has been erected in that distant land in the fulness of its integrity, let it be our earnest prayer, that its Great Head may direct all its actions, and maintain purity and simplicity in all its operations, and continue to add life and energy to all its ministrations, till all the New Zealanders come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.—Church Missionary Review.

On the Religious Opinions of Thomas Carlyle.—"There has sprung up in Boston a sect of philosophers known as Transcendentalists. On inquiring," says Charles Dickens, "what this appellation might be supposed to signify, I was given to understand that whatever was unintelligible would be certainly Transcendental. Not deriving much comfort from this elucidation, I pursued the inquiry still further, and found that the Transcendentalists are followers of my friend Mr. Carlyle, or, I should rather say, of a follower of his, Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson. This gentleman has written a volume of essays, in which, among much that is dreamy and fanciful, there is much more that is true and manly, honest and bold. Transcendentalism has its occasional vagaries, but it has good healthful qualities in spite of them: not least among the number, a hearty disgust of cant, and an aptitude to detect her in all the million varieties of her everlasting wardrobe. And therefore, if I were a Bostonian, I think I would be a Transcendentalist." It is not surprising that such works as the writings of Thomas Carlyle should have great power on the minds of a certain class. Applying the words of Dr. Skinner respecting the writings of the poet Coleridge, we may say, "There is a force of genius in them of which readers of kindred genius cannot but be deeply and delightfully conscious; and there are others whose weakness and vanity lead to a servile devotion to them. Further: amidst Transcendental emanations, in which he seems to lose himself, at least in which he cannot be followed, there are coruscations of light, exhibitions of intellectual penetration and strength, nicely discriminated, just, and most forcible statements of truth, which must command every intelligent and candid reader's admiration." Still, there are principles in his writings fraught with danger to the faith of young and ardent minds; and therefore it is that we reprint, from the last number of the American Biblical Repository, the following able article on "The Religious Opinions of Thomas Carlyle."

Its gifted writer, the Rev. Merrill Richardson, has in many passages most successfully imitated the peculiarities of Mr. Carlyle's style, and has exposed to view the evil tendencies of many of his views. At the same time he has embodied some of that gentleman's opinions upon the religious aspects of our age, which demand the most thoughtful attention from those who conduct and advocate our religious societies. It is obvious that many gifted and amiable men are impressed with the idea that the business of religon in the present day is promoted by pretence and cant. Let us not quietly conclude that this is only a manifestation of the enmity of the carnal mind against the things of God. But rather let us examine the documents, speeches, sermons, &c., that are delivered upon the subject, and resolve that in future a phraseology that may sound like religious jargon in the ears of multitudes shall not be employed, but that the most simple and appropriate terms shall alone be used, in fact, "the words of truth and soberness."

As it is probable that the writings of Mr. Carlyle are not known to some of our readers, we will enumerate those which have come under our notice.

Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, 5 vols.—The French Revolution, A History, 3 vols.—Lectures on Heroes and Hero Worship.—Chartism.—Translation of Göethe's Wilhelm Meister, containing Meister's Apprenticeship, and Meister's Travels, 3 vols.

It is not often that we would attempt to ascertain a writer's religious sentiments from his popular literary productions. Surely this would be an unfair, as well as a useless course to pursue in the case of most reviewers. But while Carlyle is pre-eminently distinguished as a man of letters, he so blends the two, religion and literature—rather, we would say, making them one and the same thing—that in reading his literary productions, we are compelled to dwell upon his singular articles of faith. His religion shows itself upon almost every page. In his estimation of men, in his criticisms upon their literature and philosophy, and in his remarks upon their views of political and ethical science, it is their religion which he first shows us; and with him this is the test by which he will try men and all their works; this is his clue to all which is worth the knowing of man and of his doings. It is a maxim with him, and he everywhere proceeds upon it, that given the religion of a man, or of a nation, what the individual or nation is will readily appear.

"A man's religion," he says, "is, in every sense, the chief fact with regard to him. Not his creed, not his profession and assertion; but the thing a man does practically believe, and lay to heart, and for certain knows concerning his vital relations to this mysterious universe; his duty and his destiny there; that is in all cases the primary thing for him, and creatively determines all the rest. This may be religion, or a no-religion; an affirmation or a denial; a heathenism or a christianism; a system embracing one God or many. Knowing what was believed, or what was disbelieved upon this subject, and we have the soul of the history of the man or the nation. For the thoughts they had were the parents of the actions they did; their feelings were parents of their thoughts; it was the unseen spiritual in them that determined the outward and actual; hence their religion is the primary fact to be ascertained about a man or a nation."

It is in accordance with the above statements that Carlyle proceeds, whenever the conduct and doings of men come in review. In his Essays, his own sentiments touching religion are freely declared. He looks at all men and at all things through a religious medium. When we least expect it, we meet with the most sublime and startling thoughts bearing on this subject. And after a close perusal of most of his pieces, the reflections which pass through the mind are of a religious cast.

We deem it proper, therefore, to attempt to ascertain Carlyle's religion, or his "no-religion," from his literary productions. The truth is, we cannot read his writings and not know very much of his peculiar faith. He lays down no creed, and yet no man's creed is more plainly written. The items of his faith are not numbered and in order like the "five points," or the "thirty-nine articles;" yet a careful study of his works will give us about as clear a view of what he believes as we have of the creed of Calvin, or of the church of England. In fact, using the term religion generically, Carlyle may be styled a religious writer; he is so understood. And we apprehend that no moralist or minister is exerting so much influence to form the religious opinions of some portions of our country as this reviewer. Says a writer in the British and Foreign Review. "We speak from some experience when we say, that the prevalent inclination of men to despise and disbelieves has been in many cases increased by the influence of Mr. Carlyle's opinions. In America, where he is said to be even better known than in England, his imitators appear to be so eager to obey his precepts by action, earnestness, and reverence, that they seriously propose to each other to cultivate originality by forgetting all the instruction they have derived from Europe, and to revive the spirit of religion by the abolition of all forms of worship, and the rejection, or what is equivalent, the indiscriminate adoption of all existing and imaginable creeds."—[Am. Eclectic for March, 1842, p. 229.]

How much influence his writings have had in causing the disturbances of a certain ecclesiastical denomination in Massachusetts, we would not wish to decide. He early received the congratulations of many literary men of that state. And the compiler of his Miscellanies, in his preface, makes the following remark:—"It is a fact worth remembering in our literary history, that his rich and cheerful genius found the earliest audience in or near New England, from young men who had complained, with the first Quaker, that in the multitude of teachers, none spake to our condition."

Carlyle is now read in many of our colleges and seminaries, with more interest than any other writer. Not read at first for his theology; but so striking and peculiar are many of his thoughts upon man's spiritual nature, and his connexion with the Deity, that he is soon studied for his religion. Novel and startling ideas respecting the general and long-established habits of thought and action are constantly suggested to the mind—quaintly and yet most significantly expressed; the whole aspect of the subject seems changed; it is new, it looks philosophical; it is dressed in an attractive, often in a fantastic garb; there come clustered around it figures of speech which would make Quintilian stare; images from the heavens above, and from the earth beneath, and from the waters and all else under the earth, rise in grotesque forms before the mind; the whole subject is so pictured out that we are forced to look—at times, at the skill of the artist—always at the figures upon the canvas. There is beauty; often the finest touches of poetry; there is sublimity of thought and diction to recommend it. We read and re-read it, and continually see more and feel deeper. All our former settled notions in matters of faith are liable to be jostled; and, in some instances, to our knowledge, have been set tottering to the fall.

That Carlyle loves the element which Madame de Stäel gave to the Germans—the air—a glance at his Miscellanies will show. Yet, with few exceptions, he does not soar so high, does not so far transcend, that the less aerial may not follow. He takes us kindly by the hand, promises us safe conduct and speedy landing, when he invites us to go with him into the azure deep of his still more transcendent neighbours. We follow—for who can help it with such cheerful company?—and if, while more unaccustomed to such giddy heights, to look upon such vast and confused prospects, we do not see objects so distinctly as he would have us, yet we feel reluctant to descend; certainly till we are satisfied there are or are not worthy sights to behold.

Familiarity with German literature, particularly with the philosophy of Kant and his expositors, would aid us much in a thorough examination of Carlyle's spiritual nature. Confessing our want of such familiarity, we proceed, with an eye upon his writings generally, to state, in as brief a manner as possible, the view Carlyle takes of most of those subjects, in treating of which he has given us a clue to his religious sentiments.

To quote particular sentences of his, and say, in these he means this or that, would be as unfair and foolish as it would be to take the same course to ascertain the religious belief of the poet. Much of his writing is poetical, though the rhyme and capital letters are wanting; and more than poetical licence must be granted him in his prose. His assertions and denials, his admirations and his condemnations, his lamentations and his rejoicings, his love and his hatred, are so often reiterated and so strongly expressed, that it is not difficult to know his moral feelings. He appears a most fearless and independent thinker. The "tight lacings" of all creeds and parties he seems utterly to discard. He stands alone, a perfect Cyclops, hurling his thunderbolts with fatal aim at whatever he hates; yet embracing with the kindest, fullest heart, whatever he loves. And he loves much and he hates much; but the objects of his affection and contempt are not those of any particular class of mortals. He is most frequently found worshipping before shrines which the civilized world has long since pronounced idolatrous; and often breaking in pieces as dumb idols the gods of the worldly, great, and learned. He is more devout in sight of the Caabah at Mecca, than before the great Cathedral of London; for he sees as clearly that the black stone in the former descended from heaven, as he does that the pomps and splendour of the latter can claim this high origin; and he would feel that in Mecca he was surrounded with more sincere worshippers than he would find in the metropolis of his own kingdom. But we hasten to the point directly before us.

And first, Carlyle's Lamentations. His burdens are those of the ancient Hebrew prophets; the unbelief, the heartlessness, the idolatry of the age. He is a perfect Jeremiah, wanting the girdle, and perhaps the tears! when he looks at the irreligion of the eighteenth, and thus far, of the nineteenth century. And his Jeremiahs are numerous, strong, and pathetic.

"Faith is almost universally wanting; sight and sound have taken its place. The church, the state, every corporation, every society and sect, has wrapt itself in forms, and sits cold and heartless, in the sable pall of death. Deep thought has left the mind; deep, ardent feeling has been excluded from the soul. Machinery has everywhere been substituted for sincere, strong, individual activity. Does one wish to suppress a vice, correct an error, burn out some of the sins of this sinning world?—he has no spiritual fire within himself, like an Isaiah, a Paul, a Mahomet, a Dante, with which to do it! Not he! To engage in such Titan labours man has now no faith or strength. His vanity cries so loud to be gratified, that he cannot engage in silent, singlehanded, patient effort. There must be a flourishing of trumpets; he must call in others to assist—at least to look on and applaud; he must form his party, issue his periodical, send out his agents, erect his chapel,—in short, he must do all by machinery. The age is mechanical. As in the physical world the draught horse is turned loose as too slow and powerless, and the fire horse harnessed in his place, so in the spiritual world, the natural, patient effort of individual man is supplanted by mechanical furtherances. And in all this there is no spirituality, no heart.

"Christianity, religion, whose only appropriate channel is the soul of man, is propagated by strictly mechanical fixtures. Instead of the exercise of pure reason, appeals are made to the same low passions and faculties for the spread of the Gospel, as for constructing a rail-road. Great meetings are called; vain and hollow-hearted speeches are made, and puffed in all the prints of the realm. What they call the spirit of piety is generated almost by the same natural process as the steam of the engineer. And then comes what is miscalled benevolence; that is, one gives a large sum—tells of it—others tell of it; then another gives because he gave; and another still, knowing that his name will be published with the sum annexed, and not liking to be out-charitied, gives; and so on through all the parts of this machinery of vanity. Is this the not letting the right hand know what the left hand does? Is this the secret almsgiving and prayer enjoined in the Gospel according to Matthew? Does not true virtue, by the very act of exposing itself, cease to be virtue? Oh for a Paul, a Mahomet, a Luther, a Knox, even a Bunyan, or a Quaker Fox that has the spiritual strength and firm faith to speak from the heart his God-given behest to this ostentatious, superficial, infidel, idolatrous age!

"Men in this age see only the surface; they have only the eye of the understanding, not the eye of reason: they bow down to forms, and sincere, soul-stirring worship is not to be found. Philosophy and chemical analysis is substituted for the feeling, worshipping heart. Man in our days sets about explaining everything. 'The world, earth, air, and water are now no longer emblems of Deity, the garment of the Eternal; but mere monads, curiously indeed, yet haphazardly thrown together; deserving and exciting no admiration. The very lightnings of heaven are nothing but electricity which any American Franklin can bottle in his jar! Everything must be accounted for, and receive a scientific name. And when men have done this, they see no more to be done: they call this understanding nature, and rest satisfied with the mere jargon of names! Thus man satisfies himself with meaningless terms, and views it a weakness to wonder and adore! 'Why,' thinks he, 'if I had the elements,' (an important acquisition we should think,) 'I could do as well, if not better, myself.' Asks your philosopher, with his shallowness and self-sufficiency, 'What is that flower, but carbon and a little nitrogen or hydrogen? It must, of course, be what it is, if you give it a little earth, air, and water! That thunder cloud which used to excite so much wonder and terror in weak minds is nothing but vapour. And the sweeping tornado, every one now knows, is only air set in motion.' The beaming eye of the beautiful maiden must be analyzed; this part called the lens; that the aqueous humour; the other the retina; what folly to be pierced to the heart with its look! Any boy can construct the same thing essentially with a glass and a piece of wood. The telescope is almost as perfect an instrument.

"Thus God is explained away and excluded from the mind, and the heart is left without an object of worship. Standing in the midst of wonder and miracles, man, with senseless indifference, now looks upon God's universe as exhibiting only a little chemistry and philosophy. A noble, religious trait of earlier times—reverence for great men, has well-nigh vanished in our days. Great men themselves are scarce; and this is deplorable enough. Rulers are not, as they formerly were, the able men, or the good men; where democratic tendencies are strong, they are mere popinjays, that have risen by their lighter specific gravity! So many assume the airs of great men that are not men at all, but the merest shams and semblances of men, people begin to distrust the reality of any greatness existing. The King, who was once a great man, clothed with authority, wondered at and feared, is now viewed as quite a small man; not a whit superior to scores of his subjects. His sceptre a piece of mere gilt wood; his crown a bit of pasteboard decked with gold. Men see in him no delegated power or quality of the Deity; but only a man like themselves, tinseled and bespangled, yet by no means to be wondered at and revered. Formerly it was not so. The king was the great man; quite god-like—a being before whom men reverently bowed. But alas! the age is become insincere, superficial. Men see nothing beyond the outward vesture of things. The 'Open Secret,' as it has been well written, is hid from their eyes.

"The same irreverence possesses the heart in view of the works of nature. God is not seen in them. We attribute to senseless names what the sincere convictions of the heart formerly ascribed to God. To the earnest Arab soul, the twinkling star, which looked down upon his desert path, was the eye of God. He felt that God saw him; and in the star he worshipped the Eternal. Now, a star is all that is seen! For the French in the last century no God existed; not so much as the symbol of a God. King, priest, the throne, the altar, the heavens above, the earth around, contained nothing of wonder or admiration. An infidel, self-conscious Voltaire, and a pretty black-eyed female of unmentionable character, were the highest objects of the nation's worship! The same godless soul was prevalent, though in a less degree, throughout Europe. While some were asserting that there was no God, others, doubtless with the best intentions, yet with the superficial logic of the understanding, were attempting to prove there was;—just as if it were a questionable point whether there really was or was not a God! Mistaken souls! is the God you worship a probable God only? Have you no ethereal reason to see a God everywhere within and around you? Will you thus apply your debating faculty—use only your parliamentary logic with which you discuss bills for taxing and feeding or starving men, to find for yourselves and them a God; and thus witlessly grant that, after all, there is a perhaps about his very existence? Bethink yourselves—how will you pray with such a perhaps in your head and heart? If you have no inner eye to see a God, hold your tongue! Cease logically to babble about it, and thereby perplex simple minds. The ignorant savage, without your logical forms of premise and inference, knows, as he knows his own existence, that there verily is a God. Take lessons from him, then, or cease thy debating! Yes, go to the men you call heathen, and learn sense from the Norwegian, the Mohammedan, the Burmese, who know what is still a matter of doubt in your own mind! The torpedo quality of your philosophy and logic has benumbed your soul, put out the clear light of reason, and destroyed all spiritual life within you. It has done to your soul what a certain chemical process sometimes does to the dead man—it has changed it to stone. The childlike awe and wonder which possessed the bosoms of the primitive races, and which was somewhat prevalent in the days of chivalry, is wanting. The fertilizing river, which awakened admiration and praise in the heart of the Egyptian and Bengalese, as a benevolent Deity, is now viewed by this infidel age only as a highway for merchandise; the beautiful, wide-spreading plain is measured to ascertain its fitness for an iron road; the majestic mountain, so far from elevating the mind and inspiring the heart, is looked upon only with a covetous eye for the mineral treasure of its bosom. The whole earth is now simply a huge cornfield, and valued at the net product of its grains!

"The same heartless superficiality pervades every department of literature, and runs through the whole of our moral science. Our poetry, for the most part, is mechanical: certainly a product of the head rather than the heart. Rules are laid down for making poetry with the same precision as for working out a problem in mathematics. We even have rhyme-books published, so that the manufacturer of poetry shall have no more to do in his business than the joiner has in his—the chief thing being happily to dovetail! No God inspired Miltons, Shakspeares, Dantes, Homers, speak to us in musical tones; giving utterance to burning souls. True, a Göethe has just spoken thus to us; but he is read by few except the truly pious of his own nation. There is indeed the dawning of a fairer day, for the snarling, impious Byron is giving place to the cheerful sacred music of Coleridge and Wordsworth. But this day yet stands tip-toe upon the tops of highest mountains;—let us praise God that all have not bowed the knee to Baal!

"And what shall one say of an age that receives as authentic, for its system of moral sciences, the Gospel according to Jeremy Bentham? Oh the times! depraved, corrupt to the core! Tremble, O earth! Hear and avenge, O heavens! Sinful man, in the Gospel according to Bentham, has no duties to do in this God's universe, where he is placed to work out an immortality of holiness, but such as the 'greatest happiness principle' shall dictate! Sweet, sweeter than the honeycomb, to him who roll sin as a sweet morsel under his tongue, will be such a system of morals! Give us a cast iron bishop from Birmingham; put a metal tongue into his sounding head, and let it peal through the universe, that pleasure and duty are synonymous terms! Sinner, speedily take your arithmetic and make your estimate; (only be cautious in your calculations.)—Will you be happier to be indolent than to be active? to remain in ignorance than to seek for knowledge? to indulge, rather than to curb, your passions? Then is duty plain! Do you love to eat and drink to the full? Look well to your digestive apparatus, and if this will endure, take thine ease—eat, drink! It is the easiest thing in the world to test, by this standard, the virtuous or the vicious quality of an action; do it as you would test the utility of a threshing machine;—are you benefited by it? For are not virtue and utility, that is the greatest personal happiness, the same? And has, let me ask, the infinite nature of duty dwindled to this? Is it so that man hears no voice speaking within him except the net result of pains and pleasures? Did the God-Man Jesus reason thus? Was Paul balancing pains and pleasures when he determined to know nothing but Christ and him crucified? Is it possible for the image of the Eternal to become so deaf to His voice? Can man, by nature so noble, and endowed at least with some glimpse of the infinite reason, believe himself a mere iron balance upon which to weigh hay and thistles?

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS.—The Royal children will, it is fully expected, reside for the benefit of the sea air in Lord Ashburton's villa at Stoke's Bay during the ensuing summer.—Pat.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert on Saturday attended a rehearsal of the choir at the Temple Church. His Royal Highness proceeded there on foot, attended by only one servant; on presenting himself at the door, being unexpected, the doorkeeper refused him admittance, at the same time offering to take his card to Mr. Calvert, the choir master. An explanation, however, soon ensued, and in a few minutes several of the benchers were in attendance, and escorted his Royal Highness over the church, at the beauties of which he expressed much admiration. After staying half an hour, the Prince proceeded home on foot, about four o'clock.—Weekly Paper.

THAMES TUNNEL.—Throngs continue to visit this "new wonder." On Monday 20,799 persons passed through.—Pat.

SIR C. BAGOT.—The accounts from Canada come down to the 10th ult. Sir Charles Bagot still continued to suffer severely from his disorder, but he had not become worse. His recovery was considered very doubtful. There had been serious rioting among the labourers on the Lachine canal, it had, however, been suppressed.—Record, 3d April.

SALE OF ANCIENT ARMOUR.—Oxenham's rooms were on Thursday crowded, it being the first day of the sale of ancient armour and decorative furniture. The Marquis of Salisbury, Earl of Clarendon, Viscount Lowther, Earl of Pembroke, Sir Gore Ousley, Sir Henry Hardinge, Mr. Bernal, M. P., Colonel North, Mr. Broadwood, &c., were among the company. The prices realized for the different articles were on the whole favourable to the purchaser, and some rare and fine specimens of ancient weapons of war, &c., were knocked down for sums very reasonable. Lot 38. A noble two-handed sword, of the sixteenth century, with fine waved blade, sold for 3*l.* 17s. 6d. Lot 43. An early German halberd and military fork was knocked down for the same sum. Lot 48. A very fine early boar spear for 2*l.* Lot 55. A pair of ebony wheel lock pistols, with globose butts and engraved silver bosses, from the collection of Dresden, for 4*l.* Lot 72. A fine polished steel shield with boss complete, brought 4*l.* 17s. 6d. Of the suits of cap-a-pie armour, Lot 132, a knight's tilting suit of fluted armour, period of Maximilian, went for the low price of 44 guineas; and Lot 136, a noble suit of tilting armour, period Henry VIII., a very fine example, was bought for 70 guineas, for a nobleman whose name did not transpire.—Record.

SCHOOL FOR SONS OF CLERGYMEN AND OTHERS.—This Institution is expected to come into full operation, and with the most cheering prospect of success, about Midsummer next. The council, consisting of eighteen life governors (one-half being clergymen, the other half laymen) have, together with the Lord Bishop of Salisbury, who has accepted the office of patron, been anxiously engaged in forming a scheme for the future management of the school, of which the following are the leading features:—The course of general study will approximate pretty closely to that pursued at Eton and Harrow, especial care being had to the religious instruction of the pupils. The Castle Hotel, a commodious edifice, situate in the town of Marlborough, in Wiltshire, has been selected as the most central, and consequently the most convenient site. When the arrangements now in progress are complete there will be ample accommodation for 200 pupils, independent of the head-masters, ushers, and servants' apartments. There are already 1,370 subscribers, a great number having qualified as life governors, and the sum subscribed, including donations, somewhat exceeds 14,000*l.* It is calculated that about 3,000*l.* will defray the incidental charges of outfit. Two-thirds of the pupils are to be sons of clergymen and one-third sons of laymen. The school will, to some extent, be a self-supporting Institution, as the friends of the pupils will be required to pay a small sum towards the maintenance of the establishment.—Record.

EXILES OF ENGLAND.—If there be a subject which needs to be dealt with practically rather than theoretically, that subject is prison discipline, and if there be a prison in which it is supereminently difficult to establish such a system of discipline as may counteract the evil tendencies of goal association, that prison is a convict ship. Dr. Browning, a man of devoted piety, and with a mind thoroughly interested in his work, has detailed in a small volume entitled The Exiles of England, the plans he pursued in several voyages to Australia and Van Diemen's Land, in charge as Surgeon Superintendent of convicts, both male and female. The extraordinary success which attended his efforts is the best proof of the soundness of the theory on which he acted, and although as a literary production the book may have but small claims upon the attention of the reading community, yet as a beautiful exemplification of the efficacy of firmness united with kindness in the treatment of this degraded class of our fellow beings, and of that persevering zeal which alone could have enabled the conductor of this experiment to have brought it to a successful issue, it will be found most worthy of the notice of every Christian philanthropist.—Ibid.

AERIAL STEAM CARRIAGE.—Without hazarding any opinion as to the ultimate success of the "AERIAL STEAM CARRIAGE," we may say that Mr. Henson's machine for the conveyance of despatches and passengers through the air, is in truth a design of very scientific conception.

All former attempts of this kind have failed through the want of a source of power whose energy bore a sufficiently high ratio to the weight of the requisite machinery. Could this source of power have been found, there was ingenuity enough to turn it to the desired account. Mr. Henson, in overcoming the difficulty, has first divided it. To set a machine going, and bring it up to a given velocity, is one thing; to maintain that velocity against opposing forces is another. How, in the case before us the power necessary for starting is much greater than that required for maintaining the flight. Mr. Henson, therefore, starts his aerial carriage by means of an apparatus which he does not carry with him, and then embarks only the smaller power and lighter machinery, which are sufficient for keeping up the original velocity.

But even this happy device would not have succeeded if the inventor had not also effected an extraordinary reduction in the weight of his steam engine. Our engineering readers will be somewhat surprised to learn that the engine of 20 horses' power now in preparation for the aerial carriage weighs, with its condenser and requisite water, but 600 lb. To the united effect of these different branches of this important invention must we attribute our present prospect of making our paths in the air.

We proceed now to describe the machine itself, and its mode of flight. Its car, enclosed on all sides, and containing the passengers, managers, burden, and steam-engine, is suspended to the middle of a framework, which is so constructed as to combine great strength with extreme lightness, and is covered with any woven texture which is moderately light and close. This main frame or expanded surface, which is 150 feet long by 30 feet wide, serves in the most important respects as wings; yet it is perfectly jointless and without vibratory motion. It advances through the air with one of its long sides foremost and a little elevated. To the middle of the other long side is joined the tail, of 50 feet in length, beneath which is the rudder. These important appendages effectually control the flight as to elevation and direction, and are governed by cords proceeding from the car. Situated at the back edge of the main frame are two sets of vanes or propellers, of 20 feet in diameter, driven by the steam engine.

We have already said that the velocity of the machine is imparted at its starting. This is effected by its being made to descend an inclined plane: during the descent the covering of the wings is reefed, but before the machine reaches the bottom that covering is rapidly spread: by this time the velocity acquired by the descent is so great that the resistance produced by the oblique impact of the sloping under surface of the wings on the air is sufficient to sustain the entire weight of the machine, just as a brisk wind upholds a kite. But while the pneumatic resistance thus procured by the velocity prevents the falling of the carriage, it opposes also its forward flight. To overcome the latter and smaller resistance is the office of the steam-engine.

The chief peculiarities of this important member of the carriage are the respective constructions of its boiler and condenser. The former consists of hollow inverted truncated cones, arranged above and around the furnace; they are about 50 in number, and large enough to afford 100 square feet of evaporating surface, of which half is exposed to radiating heat. The condenser is an assemblage of small pipes exposed to the stream of air produced by the flight of the machine. It is found to produce a vacuum of from 5 lb. to 8 lb. the square inch. The steam is employed in two cylinders, and is cut off at one-fourth of the stroke. Our engineering readers will be able to gather from these particulars, that the steam-engine is of about 20-horse power, supposing the evaporating power of the boiler to be equal, foot for foot, to that of the locomotive steam-engine.

Less certain is the determination of the resistance to be overcome. Mechanical science is notoriously defective in all that relates to the oblique impact of solids and fluids, and is particularly so on the points involved in this subject. Experiments do not supply the lack of sound theory; for, not only has their purpose been to ascertain the effects of large angles of impact to the neglect of the smaller ones here concerned, but the objects of the experimenters (Robins, Hutton, Borda, &c.) have always required the determination of the resistance in the direction of the moving body to the neglect of that which is perpendicular to that direction: while here their effects are so intimately connected that one cannot be determined without first knowing the other; and of that which is to be first known—viz, that which supports the vehicle, we have no information on which the smallest reliance can be placed. Mr. Henson, we understand, has formed his conclusions from the best observations he could make on the flight of birds, and we think he has done wisely. We are informed, however, that the resources of mechanical art are by no means exhausted by the present construction of Mr. Henson's engine, and that recent inventions are available by which its power may be doubled with little increase of weight.

The area of the sustaining surface will be, we understand, not less than 4,500 square feet; the weight to be sustained, including the carriage and its total burden, is estimated at 3,000 lb. The load is said to be considerably less per square foot than that of many birds. It may assist the conceptions of our non-mechanical readers, to add that the general appearance of the machine is that of a gigantic bird with stationary wings; that the mechanical principles concerned in its support are strongly exemplified in the case of a kite; and that its progress is maintained by an application of power like that which propels a steam-boat. In the operations of nature, particularly in the flight of birds, will be found many striking illustrations of the principles on which the inventor has proceeded.

Whatever may be the immediate issue of the present attempt, we think it is impossible not to award to the inventor the highest credit due to the removal of the great difficulties which have hitherto defeated all similar inventions; nor do we doubt, that in following out the path he has opened, complete success will eventually be obtained: whether that success will be, as we wish, early and entire, or whether it will be delayed and gradual, depends on the facts as to oblique pneumatic resistance, which have yet to be ascertained. It is, however, high time to begin to consider in the spirit of careful inquiry and cheerful hope what will be the changes, commercial, social, and political which the possession of this new-born power will necessarily bring about.

COLONIAL SCHEMES OF FRANCE.—The Chamber of Deputies began on Thursday the discussion on the supplementary and extraordinary credits required for 1842 and 1843. Most of the items were granted without any opposition. In the course of the debate on a vote of 526,400f. for the colonies, Admiral Roussin, the Minister of Marine, and, after him, M. Galos, the King's Commissary, stated that the occupation of the Island of Nissé-Bé, on the coast of Madagascar, some three years since, was a prelude to the occupation of the latter island, over which France possessed incontestable rights. "It is necessary for our policy," said M. Galos, "to hold possession of a point which will permit France, whenever she considers it advantageous to her commerce or her general interests, to assert her rights; it is necessary for her to be prepared for such a contingency, as also to oppose any attempt at invasion on the part of jealous Powers against Madagascar."

In the Chamber on Friday, attention was called to the very great mortality which prevailed amongst the troops and French colonists at Nassé Bay, the new settlement in the island of Madagascar. The King's Commissary denied that this mortality was greater than at Bourbon. M. Desjobert deprecated any extensive attempts at colonizing in Madagascar—that "would prove a second Algerie, if they did not take care." M. Guizot and Admiral Roussin both insisted on the indisputable rights of France on these points in Madagascar.

"I am convinced," says M. Guizot, "that France would commit an act of folly in seeking to renew the colonial establishments in Madagascar. In general it suits not the policy and genius of France to attempt new and great colonial establishments far from its territory, and thus commence struggles either with the natives of the country or with other Powers. But it is indispensable for France to possess in those parts of the globe, which are to be the great centres of commerce and navigation, strong maritime stations, for supplies and shelter. French shipping in those far seas, should not be obliged to have recourse to foreign ports. Thus we have taken possession of islands on the Pacific, and in Madagascar have erected a strong military post, such as we had before on the Isle of France."—Record.

It appears that the King of the French and the Royal Family will not remove to Neuilly, as has been stated, after Easter, but to St. Cloud, where they are to arrive on the 17th of next month. The apartments are now being got ready for their reception, and the marriage of her Royal Highness the Princess Clementine with Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg will be there solemnized.—Ibid.

The Journal du Havre says:—"The Government continues to send out ships to the Marquesas. Five are at this time loading at different ports; one of them, the Eole of Havre, has engaged to take 300 tons, at the rate of 94f. a ton."—Ibid.

A Belgian journal says:—"The comet seen for some days in our horizon was perfectly well observed at Jena, and the nucleus distinctly perceived. At Munich also M. Gruithuisen was able to distinguish the nucleus. He conceives that the tail must be greater than that of 1680, which measured not less than sixty degrees."—Ibid.

UNITED STATES.—The Steam-ship Great Western, Lieutenant Hosken, R. N., arrived at Liverpool on Saturday morning. She sailed from New York on the afternoon of the 16th ult., and though she encountered strong headwinds during the whole voyage, made the passage in fifteen days and twelve hours. She brought only twenty-six passengers.

The papers received by the Great Western extend from the 1st to the 16th ult.

The House of Representatives having on the 22d of February adopted a Resolution offered by Mr. Ingersoll, which called on the President to communicate the correspondence which may have passed between the United States Government and that of Great Britain on conflicting interpretations of the treaty concluded at Washington, as it concerns our alleged right to visit American vessels, on the 27th the President sent a Message to the House on the subject of the Resolution, accompanied by a Report made to him by the Secretary of State and other documents. Mr. Tyler, in his Message, admits and regrets that there is a misunderstanding between the two Governments in relation to the 8th article of the treaty, respecting the right of visitation; denies that any foundation exists for the right of visitation as set up by the Earl of Aberdeen; and suggests the doubt, as arising from the declarations of England, whether the difference is not rather one of definition than of principle. Mr. Webster's letter, accompanying the Message, reports the substance of a statement made to him as Secretary of State, and which was to the purport of a despatch from the Earl of Aberdeen relative to the passage in the President's Message on the opening of Congress, on the subject of the right of search.

The Senate had rejected two nominations of the President. Mr. Wise was three times nominated by the President as Minister to France, and as often rejected by the Senate. The vote was two to one, twelve to twenty-four. Mr. Cushing was also thrice nominated to the vacant post of Secretary of the Treasury, and thrice rejected. They had, however, confirmed the nomination of Mr. Everett, the American Minister at London, as Minister to China. Mr. Spenser, of the War Department, was nominated to the Treasury, and the nomination was confirmed by the bare majority of one. His successor, as Secretary of War, was Judge Porter.

Mr. Webster was, it was understood, on the point of retiring from the Cabinet. Mr. Cushing, it was said, would succeed him, as Secretary of State. A rumour prevailed that Mr. Webster would be appointed Minister at London, in the place of Mr. Everett, who is going to China.—Morning Papers.

UNITED STATES DEBTS.—The following remarks on the responsibility of the General Government of the United States for the payment of the bonds issued by the separate States, are taken from a speech delivered by Mr. Webster, at the merchants' Meeting, in Wallstreet, New York, on Monday, Sept. 28, 1840:—

"How does it stand (says Mr. Webster) with respect to the States? Under what patronage, and at whose recommendation, did they contract the large and onerous debt of two hundred millions of dollars? Who induced this? Under what circumstances at home was it done? It appears from the tables, supposed to be accurately compiled, that the amount of stock issued by the several States, for each period of five years, since 1820, is as follows, viz:—

"From 1820 to 1825, somewhat over 12,000,000 dollars.

|---|---|---|
| 1825 to 1830 | ... ... ... | 13,000,000 |
| 1830 to 1835 | ... ... ... | 40,000,000 |
| 1835 to 1840 | ... .. .. | 109,000,000 |

Of which amount of one hundred and nine millions, nearly the whole was issued during 1838, and 1836, and part of 1837; that is to say, in the most palmy time of the experiment. I have said that the General Government encouraged the States to contract debts, by making the currency plentiful; but they have also done this in another manner. It has been one of the favourite projects of the Administration, since the removal of the deposits, to vest the surplus revenue and the increased funds of the United States in State bonds. I do not say this is an assumption of the State debts; but I do say, that the General Government did encourage the States to issue bonds, and did endeavour to give them all the credit it could give."

He adds, in a subsequent part of the same speech, "that so long as the contraction of those State debts was favourable to the Administration, they were the foremost of all men in fostering State credit, and in encouraging the States to enlarge their liabilities." It is thus shown that Lord Aberdeen was mistaken in stating, in his reply to the Memorial of the stockholders, "that the General Government had nothing to do with the issue of the State stocks;" for, to use the words of Mr. Webster, the General Government encouraged the States to issue these bonds, and were the foremost in fostering State credit.—Record.

AMERICAN OFFICIAL SALARIES.—The salary of the President of the United States is 25,000 dollars per annum: and of each of the members of his Cabinet, 6,000, with the exception of the Attorney General, who is allowed only 4,000 dollars. Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary are each allowed 9,000 dollars a-year, except the Minister at Constantinople, who has only 6,000 dollars. A Chargé d'Affaires is allowed 4,500 dollars; but of 151 Consuls and commercial agents, only ten have any salary, the whole of the others being paid by fees. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is allowed "compensation" to the amount of 5,000 dollars a-year; and each of the inferior judges to the amount of 4,500 dollars. The "compensation" of the judges of the district courts is from 1,000 dollars to 3,500 dollars a-year. The "compensation" of the President of the Senate and of the Speaker of the House of Representatives is sixteen dollars a-day; and each of the Members of those bodies is allowed eight dollars per diem. The pay of the Members of the several State Legislatures amounts to from one dollar fifty cents. to four dollars per diem.—United States Almanack.

CRACOW.—The Gazette of Cracow announces the death, on the 14th ult., at the age of eighty years, of Count Stanislas Wodziski, who had filled the post of President of the republic during fifteen years. The Count had formerly acted as Waiwode of the kingdom of Poland, and during the French occupation was appointed Prefect of the department of Cracow. Count Wodziski was member of a great number of learned Societies, and the author of some works on botany much esteemed.—Record.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR OF BENGAL.

10th May, 1843.

Mr. L. J. H. Grey, appointed under date the 26th ultimo, Magistrate of Moorshedabad, will continue to officiate as Post Master General, until further Orders.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal is pleased to make the following Appointments:

Mr. R. Ince to be Assistant to the Salt Agent and Superintendent of Chokies at Chittagong, vice Mr. W. Kennedy deceased.

Mr. H. J. Muston to succeed Mr. Ince as Superintendent of Salt Chokies at Backergunge.

3d May, 1843.

Mr. C. A. Lushington, Assistant to the Magistrate and Collector of Sarun, to exercise the powers described in Section II. Regulation III. of 1821.

Moulvie Imdad Ullee, Moonsiff of Mulfutgunge, in Dacca, to be a first grade Moonsiff, vice Baboo Sreenath Chowdry dismissed.

Moulvie Warris Ullee, Moonsiff of Nehasi, in Midnapore, to be a ditto ditto, vice Mr. R. D. Freitas deceased.

17th May, 1843.

Mr. J. G. Campbell made over charge of the office of Special Deputy Collector of Nuddea, &c., to Mr. J. S. Torrens on the 11th instant.

Mr. A. Turnbull assumed charge of the office of Under Secretary to the Government of Bengal on the 16th idem.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal is pleased to permit Mr. J. R. Hutchinson to remain attached to the College of Fort William, for a further period, for the purpose of continuing his studies in the Hindoostanee Language.

Messrs. G. P. Money and E. Sandys, of the Civil Service, are reported qualified for the public service by proficiency in two of the Native Languages.

18th May, 1843.

The Reverend A. Garstin, Chaplain of Assam, is permitted to remain three months at Sylhet, to perform Chaplain's duties at the latter Station.

FRED. JAS. HALLIDAY;
Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal.

20th May, 1843.

The Honourable the President in Council is pleased to make the following Appointment:

Mr. W. Edwards to be Under Secretary in the Foreign Department.

17th May, 1843.

The Honourable the President in Council is pleased to attach Mr. Edwin Sandys, of the Civil Service, reported qualified for the Public Service, to the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William.

The Honourable the President in Council is pleased to attach Mr. G. P. Money, of the Civil Service, reported qualified for the Public Service, to the North Western Provinces.

T. R. DAVIDSON, Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of India.

Agra, 12th May, 1843.

Brevet Major F. Mackeson, C. B., late Political Agent at Peshawur, has obtained an extension of leave to the 6th June next.

J. THOMASON, Secy. to Govt. of India, with the Governor General.

ORDER BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL, FOR NORTH WESTERN PROVINCES.

Agra, 1st May, 1843.

Captain T. H. Sissmore, Artillery, to be Post Master at Kythal.

R. N. C. HAMILTON, Secy. to Govt. N. W. P.

MILITARY.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA.

Agra, 15th May, 1843.

The Right Honourable the Governor General has been pleased to appoint Lieutenant T. F. Hobday, of the 72d Regiment Native Infantry, to the charge of the Abkaree Department at Agra.

J. STUART, Lt.-Col.,
Secy. to the Govt. of India, Mily. Dept., with the Govr. Genl.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE PRESIDENT IN COUNCIL.

Fort William, 19th May, 1843.

No. 105 of 1843.—Captain Henry Daniel Maitland, of the 72d Regiment N. I., is permitted to proceed to Europe on Furlough, on account of his private affairs.

Lieutenant Henry Yule, of the Corps of Engineers, is permitted to proceed to Europe on Furlough, for six months, without pay, on urgent private affairs.

The leave granted by Major General Sir C. J. Napier, K. C. B., Commanding in Scinde and Beloochistan, to Lieutenant and Brevet Captain S. Smith, of the 9th Regiment Light Cavalry, to proceed to Bombay and Mahableshwur Hills, on Medical Certificate, is confirmed.

The following Promotions are made in the Ordnance Commissariat Department:

| Deputy Asst. Commissary Edward Evans to be Assistant Commissary, .......................Conductor Joseph Hamilton to be Deputy Asst. Commissary,.... | From the 3d May 1843, in succession to Asst. Commy. Peter Carey, of the Ordnance Commisst. Dept. deceased. |
| Sub-Condr. and Actg. Condr. Mathew Keane to be Conductor,..Sub-Condr. Nicholas Reilly to be Acting Conductor, ..........Acting Sub-Conductor John Borthwick to be Sub-Conductor, ..........................Serjeant Jas. Reid, of the Arsenal Establishment, to be Acting Sub-Conductor, ............ | From the 11th February 1843, in the room of Conductor Barnaby Murphy promoted to Deputy Assistant Commissary of Ordnance. |

No. 106 of 1843.—The Honourable the President of the Council of India in Council is pleased to make the following Appointment:

Lieutenant Colonel Commandant John Anderson, of the 43d Regiment Madras Native Infantry, to be a Brigadier of the 1st Class, and to the Command of the Nagpore Subsidiary Force, vacant by the death of Brigadier W. Williamson.

No. 107 of 1843.—The Honourable the President in Council is pleased to direct the announcement to the Army of the following Extract from the London Gazette, containing the grant of Honorary distinction to Captain Hubert Garbett, of the Horse Artillery, for his services in Affghanistan.

Whitehall, February 2d, 1843.

The Queen has been pleased to grant unto Captain Hubert Garbett, of the Bengal Horse Artillery, Her Royal licence and permission, that he may accept and wear the insignia of the third Class of the Order of the Doorance Empire which His late Majesty Shah-Shooja-Ool-Moolk, King of Affghanistan, was pleased to confer upon him, in testimony of His Majesty's approbation of the services, from time to time rendered by him during the Campaign in Affghanistan; and that he may enjoy all the rights and privileges thereunto annexed; provided nevertheless, that Her Majesty's said licence and permission doth not authorize the assumption of any style, appellation, rank, precedence, or privilege, appertaining unto a Knight Bachelor of these realms.

And also to command, that Her Majesty's said concession and especial mark of Her Royal favour be registered, together with the relative documents, in Her Majesty's College of Arms.

No. 108 of 1843.—The undermentioned Officers of the Infantry are promoted to the rank of Captain by Brevet, from the date expressed opposite to their names:

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ST. ANDREW'S LIBRARY.

IN reference to the Overland communication between India and England by means of Steamers direct from Suez to Calcutta; MESSRS. THACKER AND CO. regret to state, that unforeseen obstacles have arisen, which will tend to the temporary suspension of that communication and the consequent impracticability of the regularity which they had anticipated in their supplies through the Agency of the PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Apprehensive that the delay which must necessarily take place in the receipt and delivery of Periodicals and their usual Overland supplies till the line of Steamers is established, MESSRS. THACKER AND CO. take this early opportunity of stating for the information of their Constituents, that after the arrival of the HINDOOSTAN (by which vessel, PERIODICALS for MAY, and "NEW BOOKS" published up to the first week of that month, are expected,) no further consignments can be received via SUEZ, till the succeeding OCTOBER, the INDIA and GOVERNMENT STEAMERS having been withdrawn from the line and the departure of the HINDOOSTAN from Calcutta being postponed till the month of AUGUST.

At the same time, MESSRS. THACKER AND CO. beg to assure their Constituents that in the event of any opportunity offering by which greater expedition can be accomplished, their London Agents will not fail to avail themselves of it.

PERIODICALS with the only exception as before stated; delivered per OVERLAND at the same prices as via the CAPE, and NEW BOOKS and SCIENTIFIC INSTRUMENTS, &c. at an increase not more than sufficient, to meet the additional expense of transmission.

The APRIL PERIODICALS and SERIAL PUBLICATIONS with the LATEST LITERARY PRODUCTIONS as set forth in the annexed list are now daily expected by the Government Steamer "TENNASSERIM."

MESSRS. THACKER AND CO. have the pleasure to announce that,

A SECOND SERIES OF VIEWS IN AFFGHANISTAN,

consisting of 12 plates, representing the wild Scenery of the MOUNTAIN PASSES, situated between the celebrated KHYBER DEFILES and CAUBUL, in illustration of the route pursued by the British Army, during the second triumphant Campaign in that formidable country, from the original Drawings taken on the spot by

JAMES ATKINSON, ESQ.

TO CORRESPOND IN SIZE AND STYLE WITH HIS FORMER WORK; IS PROMISED TO THE PUBLIC.

THE VIEWS ARE INTENDED TO COMPREHEND—

The entrance to the Khyber, Russer Tunghee, Ali Musjid, Ghundala Beg, Lundekhana, Jellalabad, Seh Baba, Jugdulluck, Tezeen, Khoord Caubul, Seeah Sing, Caubul cantonments.

Messrs. T. and Co. take this opportunity of stating that several copies of Dr. Atkinson's first work, are en route to Calcutta per Patriot Queen.

Much disappointment having been experienced by many Constituents in consequence of this latter Work not being procurable, and as only a limited number of the second series will be issued and the Lithograph Stones be immediately destroyed, it is particularly requested that intending Subscribers will forward their names at their earliest convenience.

PLAIN COPIES WILL NOT EXCEED Rs. 40.

A FEW WILL BE COLOURED AND MOUNTED AS THE ORIGINAL SKETCHES AND NOT EXCEED Rs. 90.

The Governor General has resolved at length to return to Calcutta. His determination was formed immediately after the receipt of letters from England by the last mail. This has naturally given birth to the surmise that his return to the metropolis is occasioned by remonstrances from home, and these can have reference only to the outcry which has been raised about his Lordship's continued absence from his Council. Those who have made this a ground of censure appear altogether to have forgotten that Lord Auckland was absent from his Council during the major part of his viceroyalty; that is, for more than three years. Is it because it is deemed more necessary that Lord Ellenborough should be under the restraint of consultation, that those who never objected to his predecessor's absence for nearly forty months from the Council, clamor about his absence for fourteen months? In the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom, said the wise man, and upon this maxim it seems to be argued that the Governor General and his Council should never be separated. If Lord Auckland, it is said, had been in Calcutta under the salutary controul of the Members of the Supreme Council, he never would have issued the Simla Proclamation; and we should have had no war beyond the Indus; and one third of the Company's funded debt would have been paid off. and money would have become quite as much a drug in Calcutta as it is in London. Had Lord Ellenborough, it is said, not escaped from his Council, he would never have ordered the armies of Nott and Pollock to retire, or issued the Gate Proclamation, or extended the British rule over the kingdom of Scinde; and so to prevent any future calamities, it seems to be understood that Lord Ellenborough has been requested to return to Calcutta and take his seat at the head of his Council.

The Opium Traffic.—The last mail brings intelligence of a very strenuous effort which has been made in the House of Commons to extinguish the use of Opium in China, and we are told that the motion would probably have been carried if Sir Robert Peel had not represented the embarrassment which this interference of the House might occasion to the commercial arrangements which Sir Henry Pottinger is now negotiating with the Chinese authorities. The motion was withdrawn, but the spirit of earnestness with which it was advocated, leave no reason to doubt that it will be renewed at an early period.

The subject is beset with practical difficulties, which appear to have been imperfectly appreciated by those who are urged on by the warmth of their moral sensibilities. Our own opinion of the injurious tendencies of the use of the drug have been repeatedly submitted to our readers; and we have seen little reason to modify them. Some individuals, it is true, have endeavoured to shew that these evils have been greatly exaggerated, and that like every other stimulant, opium is injurious only when used to excess—forgetting that each act of indulgence is a natural step towards excess, and that the ultimate ruin attending that consummation is to be proportionally attributed to every part of the progress which led to it. They have adduced instances of individual Chinese, whose mental and bodily activity has not been affected by the long continued use of opium. But the balance of testimony is evidently on the other side of the question. Those who deprecate the use of opium by the Chinese on the ground of its deleterious effects, are stronger in numbers and in experience than those who maintain an opposite opinion. Opium may be harmless when used in moderation; but it is less used in moderation, and it runs more to excess than almost any other stimulant. Those who have once contracted the habit, find it impossible to shake it off, and are imperceptibly led by a kind of necessity to increase the dose. It would be far better for the interests of mankind if the drug was again confined to the druggists' shops. We should not have ventured thus to allude to our own humble opinions on this subject, but for our anxiety to guard against the suspicion of having changed them, because we cannot see our way clear to the adoption of the remedies proposed by the philanthropic Lord Ashley.

Admitting then that the Opium plague is as great and deplorable as it is represented to be, still it is much to be questioned whether the cure now proposed will be effectual, and whether the attempt to apply it, will not create a greater evil than that which it is designed to remove. Lord Ashley proposes in the first place to destroy the Government monopoly of the article, because the advances made by the state are supposed to be the chief stimulant of the cultivation. We will not stop to enquire how far it may be equitable towards the Government or the people of India, to dry up one of those sources of supply which Parliament established at the time when it charged the revenues of this country with the payment of £630,000 a year for twenty years, to indemnify the Proprietors of East India Stock at home for the loss of their China trade. The answer would probably be that moral considerations are of higher obligation than those which refer to pounds, shillings and pence. We are dealing with a question of fact. Would the abolition of the monopoly increase or diminish the supply of opium? We venture to think that it would tend vastly to increase the cultivation. Opium would necessarily be raised on all those fields which have hitherto been devoted to it, and on many more where it is now prohibited. That feeling of prudence which leads Government to limit the cultivation to 20,000, when it might raise 40,000 chests, in order that the market may not be glutted, would disappear amidst the competition of private speculations, and we might discover too late that the monopoly of the state had served as a check upon over cultivation. Neither ought we to leave out of view the probability that the abandonment of the Monopoly would lead to the cultivation of the poppy in every part of the country, and to the increased consumption of opium by our own subjects. Such is found to be the result in Assam of the absence of that check on cultivation which the monopoly imposes. Almost every agriculturist has his little patch of poppy, and grows his own opium, and the consequence is that the use of the drug is as universal as it is deleterious. Still, the connection of the British Government with the monopoly of an article which is valuable only as an export to a country into which it can be introduced only by a violation of its laws, is so inconsistent with our national dignity, that we would cordially join with Lord Ashley and his supporters in advocating the early and entire extinction of the monopoly, even at the risk of increasing the export.

But Lord Ashley seems to entertain a doubt whether the extinction of the monopoly would secure the suppression of the trade, and he therefore goes a step further, and proposes at once to prohibit the cultivation of the poppy throughout India. In extreme cases Government must of course possess a right to impose any such restriction on the agricultural industry of its subjects. All government is but a series of restrictions on individual freedom for the public good; but no restriction can be justified except on a palpable and undeniable necessity; where this plea is wanting, the exercise of authority degenerates into tyranny. No such case of necessity can be made out in the present instance. The cultivation of the poppy is not injurious to the country itself; on the contrary it is a source of prosperity to all those who are engaged in it. To say that the drug thus raised is injurious to the subjects of another state, who cannot use it in moderation, any more than Joseph's brethren could speak peaceably to him, is no sufficient excuse for prohibiting the growth of it in India, and thus inflicting a sensible injury on its peasantry. Still less consistent would it be to extinguish the growth of the article, the cultivation of which affords support to many thousand industrious families, on the ground that when sent to China it interferes with the consumption of British manufactures. This would be a barefaced sacrifice of the interests of India to those of a few manufacturers at home. It would be an act of signal injustice; yet with the exception of Lord Ashley and a few of his supporters, it is chiefly upon this narrow and indefensible ground that the main opposition to the opium trade in England rests. The brandy of France, when imported into England, is in too many instances taken to excess, and produces the most brutalizing effects. Yet it would be not only absurd but unjust for the French Government to make this a ground for prohibiting the culture of the vine in its own country. It may also be urged with truth, that while the British Government continues to demand the punctual payment of rent from the cultivators, it is the dictate of justice that they should be at liberty to turn their lands to the best account by the cultivation of whatever article they consider likely to yield the highest return. Nor in considering this subject should we forget the necessity imposed on every Government of acting with consistency; and where would be the consistency of prohibiting the manufacture of opium in India while the manufacture of spirits is permitted and encouraged at home, with a view to the benefit of the public revenue?

But the real question with which we have to deal, relates not so much to the expediency or the justice of this prohibition, as to its practicability. Supposing Government to enact a law prohibiting the cultivation of the poppy under severe penalties; can that law be enforced? We think not. This prohibitory law must be carried into execution through the agency of native officials, and they must be invested with the power of interfering with the agricultural population of the country. Reasoning from universal and uncontradicted experience, we at once affirm that this power will inevitably be turned into an engine of oppression to the people, and of illegal profit to the officer. There would moreover be endless collusion, and corruption. The poppy would be clandestinely cultivated; it would be clandestinely conveyed down the river in spite of the largest fleet of Custom-house boats we could establish, and it would be clandestinely exported to China. All the evils of a contraband cultivation, added to those of a contraband trade, would be introduced, in an aggravated form, into our own provinces. It would become the interest of thousands of individuals to defeat the laws; and a spirit of resistance to public authority would be fostered in every district. The demoralization of our own provinces would be complete, while the relief to China would be extremely uncertain. Contraband opium, the growth of our own provinces, would still find its way into that empire; and whatever was wanting in the supplies sent from Calcutta, would be amply made up from the fields of Malwa.

Melancholy as the prospect may seem, there do not appear any means within the reach of our Government by which the consumption of opium in China can be arrested. The measures hitherto suggested would only serve to spread misery and disorder through our own provinces, without any benefit to China. Every effort of the Chinese Government to cure the evil has also failed. In spite of the most stringent laws, and the most sanguinary execution of them, the consumption has increased from 4000 chests to 40,000. So besotted are the Chinese by the use of the drug that they will part with every thing they possess to obtain it. On the line of Coast extending to the length of 800 miles, where almost every man is favourable to the "free trade" of the smuggler, there is no possibility of establishing an efficient Coast guard. Where every facility for obtaining the drug is thus combined with the strongest desire for it, the public authorities of the country can do nothing. We question whether the aid of our Government, which is so little able to protect its own Coast from the visit of the smuggler, would be altogether effectual; but we are certain that Parliament would never sanction from year to year the expense of a naval establishment kept up for this purpose.

The opium question is the most difficult problem we have to solve in China, and while it continues unsettled, the harmony now established between the two countries will be liable to continual interruption. It is easy to say, let the Chinese enforce their own laws against smuggling. It cannot be allowed. Our Government cannot remain silent while British subjects are strangled for the sin of smuggling, heinous as it may be. The execution of the first victim would moreover be the signal for a bloody contest with the Chinese authorities on the part of the smugglers. Thenceforward they would cease to give quarter; and the acts of violence committed by them in a spirit of revenge, would soon compromise the peaceful relations of the two countries. The Chinese Government has, we fear, no alternative but that of adopting that measure which of all others the smugglers most deprecate, the legalization of the trade, and the admission of the article on the payment of a duty, calculated on fiscal and not prohibitive principles. If the article is thus admitted into the five ports which have been selected for trade, the occupation of the smuggler would be in a great measure superseded.

THE VOWS OF EPISCOPAL CLERGYMEN.—A discussion has just been revived in the papers relative to the conduct of some of the Missionaries of the Propagation Society to the South of Calcutta, who have been charged by the Missionaries of other denominations with having invaded their fields of labour, and endeavoured to proselyte the converts connected with them, to the Church of England. The facts have been so well authenticated, and the success of these efforts is so lamentably apparent in the distress which has been occasioned to the Dissenting congregations in that neighbourhood, that any farther allusion to the subject appeared to be redundant, more especially as the hope of redress was altogether a forlorn one. We had therefore resolved to refrain from taking any share in the discussion, when we were startled by the following sentences which appeared in the Star of Saturday last.

"Meantime it occurs to us—observe we do not enter into the right or wrong of the doctrine, but note it as a fact, that the ordination vows of the ministers of the Church of England, (vows we presume exacted by Bishop Wilson of both Messrs. Jones and Driberg) aggressive against dissent from that Church, are imperative upon them. That it is advisable or right, in Missionary proceedings, may be, indeed some think is, a point not contemplated by those vows, but until this be decided, an Episcopal minister can, plainly, not be arraigned for acting up to them, but, if at all, for not acting up to them."

This assertion places the matter altogether in a new light. According to this doctrine, the Missionaries of the Propagation Society may spare themselves any farther labour of disproving their interference with the Dissenting congregations. Their only duty is to prove that they have carried on a series of aggressions against them—because this alone can shew that they have not been unfaithful to their ordination vows. If this interpretation of the vows be correct, every Minister of the Church of England is bound by the most sacred obligation, to engage in a perpetual crusade against Dissent. Every feeling of sympathy with Christians of other denominations; every act of friendly co-operation with them, in the great work of evangelizing the heathen, is a violation of their vows; and every act of aggression becomes an act of merit. If ever the Episcopal clergy lay themselves open to censure it is when they become forgetful of those vows, and suspend their hostility.

Whether these principles are in accordance with the doctrines which our Saviour inculcated by precept and example, we need not stop to enquire. Whether they are the principles of the United Church of England and Ireland it is for our contemporary to prove. We will boldly venture to affirm that he is altogether mistaken in supposing that every minister vows at his ordination to wage a prepetual war of aggression against all those who differ from his own Church. Immediately on seeing his article, we referred to the Prayer Book, and carefully read over the Form and manner of ordaining of Deacons and Priests, in order to discover this hostile vow. We found that the Bishop was bound to enjoin on the Priest "to maintain and set forward as much as in him lay quietness, peace and love among all Christians, and especially among those that are or should be committed to his charge;" but we could no where discover any oath or vow, which could be tortured into an obligation of perpetual war on Dissent. We must therefore apply to our contemporary for a farther explanation on the subject. We think he will discover that he has been altogether misled by the interested assertions of some enemy of the Church of England, who is anxious to vent his spleen on the establishment, and hold it up to public contempt by representing the Bishop as binding every minister by his ordination vows to persecute every man who does not belong to his own Church. Surely if any such oath had been administered by the Bishop of Calcutta to the Rev. Mr. Jones and the Rev. Mr. Driberg, the enquiries which his Lordship subsequently instituted as to the truth or falsehood of the charges of having made aggressions on Dissenters, which had been brought against them, must have been a farce, and something worse. His Lordship must have known all the time—that is, if the Star gives us true light—that the substantiation of these charges, so far from being a matter of censure, would only serve to increase their merit as members of the Church of England. And those Reverend gentlemen when thus questioned by their Ordinary, instead of endeavouring to disprove the allegations, might have pursued a more straight forward course and have informed his Lordship, that they had only been acting in the spirit of those vows which he himself had imposed on them, and that the war they had waged against Dissent, and the success with which their efforts had been crowned, gave them an additional claim on his esteem. We are perfectly convinced that our contemporary is mistaken or misinformed, and that the Minister of the Church of England is not bound by his vows to make war, like a Mahomedan Gazee, upon all who will not conform to his rule of faith and practise.

DACOITIES.—It may be in the recollection of the reader, that several years back Major Sleeman, whose organized system for the suppression of the Thugs had proved so eminently successful, was appointed by Lord Auckland, Commissioner for the suppression of Dacoities in the North-west provinces. He took the field without loss of time against the Budducks, the hereditary and professional dacoits. Among the individuals arrested was Lukha, then about forty-five years of age. The confessions made by him to Major Sleeman, we now proceed to notice from printed documents with which we have been favoured by Mr. Dampier, the Superintendant of Police. They disclose many facts relative to the state of society, both interesting and important.

"My name," says he, "is Lukha; my father's name was Sadulea, a Budduck of the Solankee cast; my age is forty-five. I have always followed the trade of my father, dacoitee." He began his profession at the age of twenty-five, at the instigation of Man Sing, who had been engaged in 'a hundred enterprizes.' This man was twice sentenced to transportation and branded in the forehead, but he made his escape, came back, and returned to his old trade. He was transported a third time, and no more was heard of him. Man Sing, said Lakha, asked me why I condescended to be a drudge at the plough while I might get so much more by following my brother-in-law, a notorious leader of dacoits. Lakha was captivated by this discourse about dacoits, and determined to join them. In the course of the next twenty years he was engaged in no less than forty-seven dacoities, through the whole range of the Western Provinces, from Moradabad to Beerbhoom. In these expeditions the gang with which he was associated, put to death sixty-one, and wounded two hundred and forty-nine persons, and carried off property to the value of two lakhs, seventy-three thousand, nine hundred and sixty-nine Rupees. The wealth which these villains were enabled to accumulate in spite of our Police, is among the most remarkable circumstances developed in the depositions. Thus we learn that Meherban, a Jemadar or leader, who was executed at Gaya, had amassed a lakh of Rupees, which he bequeathed to his favourite wife Moneea,—he had seven—who maintained fifty of her husband's Budduck followers from this fund.

The systematic arrangements of these dacoits in the very heart of our dominions, in which it is our boast to have created such security of life and property as the country had not previously enjoyed, is calculated to shake our confidence in our judicial institutions. A sirdar dacoit or two determine to set out on a plundering expedition, and beat up for recruits. After having assembled a body of twenty, thirty, or forty, under different leaders, their first business is to contribute to a common fund for their subsistence till they can obtain plunder. Each leader contributes according to his means. They then proceed to consecrate the enterprize by religious rites, and this appears to be easily accomplished, for few of these expeditions are recorded in which they were not attended by one or more brahmuns. The Buddacks appear in fact to be among the most religious of men, and to enter upon no undertaking till they have some assurance that the Gods will be propitious to them. Thus we find Meherban, before the gang started, lifting up his joined hands in supplication, and saying, "If it be thy will, O God, and thine Kalee, to prosper our undertaking for the sake of the blind and the lame, the widow and the orphan, that depend upon our exertions, vouchsafe we pray the call of the female jackal on the right." All the rest lifted up their joined hands to heaven and repeated the prayer after him. On this occasion, the female jackall, "inspired of the Deity to call in that direction in answer to our prayers," called three times on their left. The party then proceeded to Benares and made their offerings at the holy places; and while some were engaged in these sacred duties, four of their gang were sent to look after booty; there being, as the deponent said, two mints at work, one in the cantonments, the other in the city, and we had our eyes on both. It seems, as though superstitious devotion was an invariable characteristic of all men in all countries who live by public plunder. The robbers of Italy are not more constant at the shrine of the Virgin, than are the Buddacks in Hindoostan at the image of Kalee. On every emergency they look up to Heaven for assistance, and every instance of deliverance is devoutly ascribed to divine interposition. Thus we find that on one occasion, after having committed a robbery, and arrived on the banks of the Ganges, they broke the only pole in the boat, in their anxiety to hasten across, and lay helpless in the water. At last, says the leader, a lucky thought struck me. Dipping both hands into the money and ornaments they had just purloined, he gathered as much as they would hold, and lifting them up to heaven, said, "O Mother Ganges, O Bhuguwan, preserver of the universe, rescue us from this calamity." Saying this, he flung the treasure into the holy stream as an offering. The Deities, says he, no doubt heard my prayer and were pleased with my offering, for the boat began to approach the shore, and we landed at dawn.

Their next business is to take the omens, and to administer an oath of fidelity to each other. The auspices are taken, sometimes by consulting a learned brahmun, sometimes by sacrificing a goat, when all the party dip their fingers into its blood, and thus take the oath of mutual fidelity. Sometimes however the oath is taken while they stand up to the middle in the stream. These oaths are intended not so much to ensure mutual support in time of need, as to prevent the abstraction of any part of the booty by particular dacoits. On one occasion, two of the party having secreted 500 Rs. for themselves, demanded their share of the general plunder, and took an oath on the Ganges that they had not retained a Rupee. "But one of them was severely punished for his false oath, for mother Ganges covered him with leprosy." They seldom depart on any particular enterprise till the omens are favourable; the howling of a female jackal on the left being the most auspicious token they can obtain. On one occasion they entered upon an expedition without taking the auspices, and were unsuccessful. The treasure had been dispatched the previous day, and they had passed it on the road without recognizing it. In the deposition which relates to this dacoity, we have an exposition of their philosophical notions of destiny: "Had we taken the auspices, we should have known from them that we were to get little, but should have got neither more nor less. The getting or not getting booty depends on our destiny, and not upon omens. And destiny depends upon Bhuguwan, the great disposer of all things. What we get is given by him. The spirits of our ancestors we worship, to keep them in good humour, as minor Gods—they can of themselves give nothing—they may be able to point out good or evil to us, and guide us to the one, and save us from the other."

There is not only a feeling of religion among these thieves; there is likewise honesty. Before they start, the share which each one is to receive, is accurately settled. That share is regulated by the number of men each chief takes with him. "The women and children, the lame and the blind, must all share; the rates allotted to them are determined in the general assembly before we start, to secure the rights of the dependents of those who may be killed in the enterprize or die." The widow and children of those who fall either receive a large portion of the booty at once, or a regular share of the spoils till the widow marries again. This feeling for the weaker vessels is not confined to those of their own party. When alluding to a female who was suffered to depart with all her ornaments on her, the deponent observes, "We do not touch anything that a female has on her person, or offer any indignity or insult to a female. They who do so are considered to disgrace our order."

After these preliminary arrangements have been made, they set out on their expedition, generally in the disguise of carriers of Ganges water, sometimes as bird catchers, at other times as pilgrims. The better to baffle public suspicion, they occasionally travel in company with their women and children, who are left in some wood at a distance from the scene of their depredations. They take with them no other weapons than their spear and axe heads, purchasing handles for them in some neighbouring village, where they also construct a bamboo ladder. The expedition is arranged with military precision after dusk. After having reconnoitred the spot, and noted the facilities for ingress and egress, one party is left at the encampment, a second division is formed into a covering party, and takes its post at the position most favourable for succouring the actual robbers, who light their torches, plant their scaling ladders on the wall, and enter the premises, where in the majority of instances they appear to have had a stout resistance to encounter. Sometimes the whole town is raised, and the conflict becomes serious, but it seems to be a part of their tactics invariably to carry off their wounded. They appear in no instance to have been pursued beyond the precincts of the town in which they have committed robbery. They regain their encampment with speed, divide the spoil, and either return home, or engage in a second expedition, if their scouts bring them favourable intelligence, and the omens are auspicious.

These depredations have been carried on through the whole extent of the Western Provinces, but chiefly in the districts which surround the Oude territory, in which they are able to obtain shelter. Their professional avocations appear to be well known in the villages in which they reside, and they are committed with the full cognizance of the Zemindars, who are entitled to and receive a fourth of the plunder as their accustomed right. The successful operations of Major Sleeman's establishment for the suppression of Thuggee suggested to Lord Auckland the advantage of committing the suppression of dacoities to his charge, and he addressed himself to the duty with his accustomed energy. He was not long in ascertaining, through means of his approvers, the names and residence of the leaders in these daring outrages. He commenced a hot pursuit of them. The deponent, whose statements we have embodied in this article, stated, that on hearing that a great man had come to Moradabad, who was determined to seize all the Budducks, they dispersed in different disguises to the quarters they considered most safe. Their occupation was gone; and he had determined to fly to the Oude Terai, when he was seized by two of Major Sleeman's Nujeebs. He denied that he was a Budduck, but he was notwithstanding taken to Moradabad, where he was confronted with some of his old friends; and, finding farther evasion useless, confessed the various dacoities in which he had been engaged. Search was made in the various records of the various Courts; and the statements thus obtained regarding the dacoities which had been committed, tallied so exactly with the confessions of the man, as to leave no doubt of their correctness.

Capt. Marsh, one of Major Sleeman's Assistants, has been equally successful in seizing some of the leaders of the professional dacoits in Bengal, and their depositions are so clearly corroborated by the records of the Courts, as to remove all doubt of their authenticity.

These men are called Kechuks. Of the three deponents, whose statements we have received, two were born in Bootan, but the scene of their depredations has lain in our own territories. One of them has given a circumstantial description of the robbery committed two or three years ago at Sadamahl on the premises of the Rev. Mr. Smylie. Munsaram Sirdar, who accompanied the gang, shewed him the English watch he had brought away. He had just started on another expedition with eighteen men when he was seized by the Zemindar and made over to the Thuggee Officers.

The other deponent, Behadoor, a native of Bhagulpore, seems to have carried on his professional career through Bengal. He confesses to having been engaged in dacoities in Dinagepore, at Chagda, at Dacca, and at Moorshedabad. The robbery committed at Sulkea opposite Calcutta about five years ago on some salt merchants, is traced up to him. Strange to say, he affirms, that he and his companions started from an Indigo factory managed by an individual with a European name, and that they gave him 200 Rs. of the booty. He says, he remained two years at the factory, during which three robberies were committed with the full cognizance of the European. Should the gentleman alluded to be still in India, it will of course be indispensible for him to come forward, and clear his character from the imputations cast on it by this Kechuk.

THE INCOME TAX.—The last Mail brought intelligence that the receipts under the income tax for the first quarter of 1843 had amounted to One million, eight hundred thousand Pounds Sterling, which is at the rate of Seven millions and a half sterling a year, nearly double the amount originally calculated upon. It has always appeared to us that an income tax fairly levied, was the most equitable and least burdensome of all taxes, however galling its operation might prove in individual cases. There can be little doubt that the sum which this tax is likely to bring into the Treasury, could have been raised by no other means at the present juncture, while at the same time its pressure is likely to be but partially felt by the community. The inquisitorial machinery of the tax is that which renders it most objectionable in the eyes of Englishmen; but its tendency is not only to induce habits of economy, but to assist them by reducing the expense of living. It is also the fairest of all schemes of assessment, more epecially in the mode in which it has in this instance been applied; for while it exempts from contribution all those whose means are under 150£ a year, it constrains the wealthy to contribute to the state in exact proportion to their resources. We trust that all inequalities will be gradually removed, and with them all ground of reasonable complaint, and that the tax itself will never be abandoned. Indeed, the equity and the success of this mode of assessment will probably be found to have wrought so decided a change in public sentiment, as to induce many even of those who were originally opposed to it, to give their suffrage for its continuance, when the period for which it was voted has expired.

This tax places the Ministry in a very advantageous position as it respects domestic taxation. It gives them so large a surplus income as to enable them freely to sweep away a whole litter of petty vexatious imposts, and to promote national industry by removing heavy burdens from the staple articles of consumption. It enables them to deal with the general question of taxation upon broad and sound principles. In reference to foreign governments, who had been led to fancy that England was rendered powerless by fiscal disabilities, and might be insulted with impunity, the tax cannot have failed to produce a very powerful and salutary impression. The imposition of a war tax in time of peace at once demonstrated the strength of the Ministry, and the complete command they had obtained over the resources of the country. The result of the tax has shewn other states, that notwithstanding the pressure of a debt, the existence of which would have been deemed utterly incredible in the greatest empires the world has ever seen, notwithstanding the competition of the European world with our manufactures and commerce, the resources of England are quite as elastic as ever; and that in addition to all the other assessments to which she is subject, she can raise a new income equal to the whole annual revenue of Prussia, almost without its being felt. Let there arise a necessity for more taxation to support the national honour and interests, and this tax may be trebled, and a revenue larger than the whole income of Russia raised, without at all impairing the springs of national prosperity. Within the last five years England has been engaged in expensive wars in Canada, in Syria, in Central Asia, and in China,—in countries scarcely known to romance in the days of Queen Elizabeth. In maintaining her interests on those widely separated theatres of action, her public finances have been thrown into disorder, and a debt of seven millions sterling accumulated. We are not going to censure the Whigs for this financial embarrassment. The wars into which they were plunged, grew out of the imperious necessity of circumstances, and it is to their credit that these extensive operations by sea and land were carried on with so small an increase of debt. But debts were contracted, which filled the public mind with despondency. A single tax has since been levied, the least felt tax of such magnitude which could have been imposed, and the whole amount of the debt contracted in these operations, is paid into the Exchequer in a single twelve month.

The operation of the Income tax has disclosed the real state and condition of England with a degree of accuracy which could have been obtained by no other process; and the result is in the highest degree animating. It is now apparent that while our national debt has been stationary, for the last twenty-eight years, the income of individuals, which constitute our national resources, has more than doubled. It is seen that the debt owing by the commonwealth, stupendous as it is, is less than the amount of three years' income of its members. It is established by the collection of this tax that the condition of the country is not desparate, as some have been led to suppose, and that there is still a firmness in our national resources, capable of meeting any crisis which the progress of circumstances may create. Had the income tax produced no other good than to disclose the actual state of the country, and thus to diffuse a general spirit of confidence through the community it would have accomplished an object of the first importance. Never we believe have our finances been exhibited in a more flourishing state than at the present time. The drain upon the Treasury from foreign wars has ceased; the home establishments have been reduced; a surplus income has been secured with comparatively little inconvenience, and the Ministry may now remove those burdens which have bent down the springs of national industry, and restore their elasticity. With an exchequer replenished from sources which are permanent, they may attend to the wants of the lower orders, with a generous courage, and again lighten up the countenance of the peasant and the artisan with a smile.

STOCQUELER'S MEMORIALS OF AFFGHANISTAN.—We have much pleasure in bringing to the notice of our readers, this valuable Compilation of the State Papers and Military Despatches relative to the War in Affghanistan. They extend from its commencement at the end of 1838, to its close in 1842; and include almost every document of value connected with the transactions of the war, with the exception of those which have subsequently appeared in the Blue Book, of which Mr. Stocqueler will probably avail himself should his work be reprinted in England. These documents are connected by a thread of narratives, which enables the reader to comprehend the events to which they relate. Had the writer been compiling a History of the War, he would of course have given more of a historical character to these narratives; but his object appears to have been simply to assist the recollections of the reader by recalling to his mind the sequence of events to which the papers refer. In this he has fully succeeded. The present volume is intended partly for reference,—and in this respect will be found of great value—and partly for the benefit of those who have watched the progress of the war, and are already acquainted with all its most prominent circumstances. Though not a History of the Affghan war, yet it brings together and preserves from destruction, the most important materials for the construction of such a History. We are sorry to see that the support it has received is limited to about two hundred and forty subscribers; and we would hope that a sufficient number of copies may yet be disposed of, not only to cover the mechanical expense of printing, but to remunerate the mental labour of compiling it.

REVIEW OF LIEUT. EYRE'S NARRATIVE.—(continued from page 339.) The first day of the insurrection, when it might have been crushed with perfect ease, was allowed to pass without any effort whatever, and thus commenced a series of military blunders unparalleled in our annals in the east. From that day the army may be said to have been doomed to destruction by the indecision of its own military chiefs, not by the interference—as it is the fashion of the times to assert,—of the civil authorities. Had Sir William Macnaghten been at the head of the Cantonment, there is every reason to believe that the catastrophe would have been averted. Napoleon, on one occasion, seeing the inactivity of the enemy opposed to him, exclaimed, the Austrians know not the value of moments, and the same remark may be aptly applied to the conduct of the General on whom the safety of the troops depended at this crisis. Of all emergencies, it is in a popular insurrection that moments are of most value, but on this occasion, hours and days were thrown away, when every moment was worth its weight in gold.

We have already stated, that on the first day of the insurrection, General Shelton was sent up into the Bala Hissar for the purpose of watching the progress of events, instead of endeavoring to control them, by clearing the city of the handful of insurgents who occupied it. The second day passed away in inaction, and that inactivity swelled the number of the enemy every hour. If any thing could have served to rouse the Commander from his torpidity, it would have been the triumphant return of Major Griffith, with the 37th, who had run the gauntlet of the Khoord Cabul, and fought their way gallantly through the ranks of an active enemy, without the loss of any part of their baggage, save a few tents which were abandoned for want of carriage. After his return, an attempt was made to effect a junction at the Lahore gate of the city with some troops from the Bala Hissar; but Major Swayne, who commanded the detachment, met with such opposition that he fell back upon cantonments, and this unfortunate occurrence added fresh fuel to the flame of insurrection. The hope of quelling it even at this early period, waxed fainter and fainter, and an order was despatched to General Sale to return to Cabul, and to General Nott to dispatch reinforcements from Candahar; and thus passed the second day, the 3d November.

By an act of unaccountable indiscretion, the Commissariat stores had been left in a separate fort at some distance from the cantonments, with Mahomed Sheriff's fort and the King's garden lying between. By an act of still greater indiscretion, this fort, which had been entrusted to a young officer and a hundred men, was not reinforced during the 2d or 3d of November, nor was any effort made to bring the provisions and ammunition into the cantonments. On the 4th, the enemy took possession of Mahomed Sheriff's fort,—which lay within a hundred yards of the cantonment,—and of the royal garden, and laid siege to the Commissariat fort. Lieut. Warren who commanded it, earnestly represented the danger of his position. The General immediately determined to abandon the fort with all its stores, and sent Ensign Gordon to bring off the little garrison. The party was driven back and the Ensign killed. A second party consisting of two Companies of the 44th, was sent out for the same object. A destructive fire was opened on them from Mahomed Sheriff's fort and the Garden; Captains Swayne and Robinson were killed, two officers wounded, and the party retired to cantonments. Capt. Boyd, the Commissariat officer, hearing of the General's intention to abandon the fort, represented that there were only three days' provisions in the cantonments; that if the supplies in the Fort were lost, the troops must be exposed to starvation; and the enemy inspirated to an irrepressible degree. The General, on this, sent orders to Lieut. Warren to hold out the fort to the last extremity. He sent back word that the enemy was pressing him so closely that he could not hold out much longer, and that his men were deserting him. At nine that evening an assembly of officers was held at the General's, when the Envoy came in and stated his conviction, that unless Mahomed Sheriff's fort was taken that very night, we should lose the Commissariat fort and all the provisions and ammunition. The General alluded to the disasters of the morning, and appeared very unwilling to expose the troops to a second risk. Hours were lost in deliberation which ought to have been devoted to action. At length at four in the morning of the 5th Nov. orders were given for a detachment to advance, but it was dawn before they got under arms; and just as they were on the point of marching, it was reported that Lieut. Warren had been obliged to abandon the fort and had brought off his men through a hole in the wall. This was, says Lieut Eyre, the first fatal blow to our supremacy in Cabul. It is impossible to read the record of this indecision and its fatal result, without feelings of burning indignation. As soon as the fort was evacuated the enemy rushed in and plundered it. A cry was raised in the Bala Hissar in the morning that the Commissariat Fort was lost. The officers and men hurried to the top of that fortress, when with the naked eye "the melancholy and heart rending sight was visible. Grain, wine, hermetically sealed provisions, and stores of every kind, were thrown over the wall, and seized and carried off by the enemy below. The King was dreadfully agitated, and turning to the Vizier said, "the English are mad," and never did the old man utter a truer sentence. In consequence of the loss of the Commissariat stores, the party which had been prepared to go against Mahomed Sheriff's fort was halted till midday. Lieut. Eyre was appointed to work the Horse Artillery guns, under cover of which Major Swayne with the storming party, was to enter the gate. The guns were brought into play and continued to fire for twenty minutes, but Major Swayne, instead of rushing forward, remained stationary under cover of a wall by the road side. The General, who was watching the operations, seeing the fire from the guns slackened for want of ammunition, recalled the party; and thus left the enemy to triumph in our disgrace. Our troops became disheartened, while the enemy gained confidence as rapidly as we lost it; and as Lieut. Melville justly observes in his narrative, they themselves have since said, that the events of this day did more harm to our cause than all the others put together. The minds of the wavering were decided against us; the Kusilbashes, seeing our weakness and inefficiency, joined our opponents, while "the report of the immensity of the plunder taken from the Feringees spread like wildfire through the country, and the ploughman forsook his plough, the shepherd his flocks and all ranks hurried to the capital, to share in the booty and spoil of the English dogs." From this day forward the insurrection may be considered as having become general.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 1.

— The Singapore Free Press, of the 13th of April, gives a long and painfully interesting account of the imprisonment of five Roman Catholic French Missionaries by the authorities of Cochin China who subjected them to the grossest indignities, and to severe torture, to induce them to abjure the religion of Jesus. They were at length rescued from the hands of their savage persecutors by the Commander of the French ship of war, L'Heroine, who threatened, if they were not released, to sail up to the capital and bombard it. We gather from this account that the present occupant of the throne is as bitterly opposed to the spread of Christianity as his predecessor was, who persecuted the Christians, and broke up their establishments, and obliged the Vicar Apostolic, the late amiable Bishop Taberd, to fly for his life.

— Letters and papers from Moulmein to the 17th of May have been received. Major Broadfoot had begun his Government with a demonstration of vigor, which in the opinion of some was highly necessary, and according to others, altogether uncalled for. We are anxious to avoid mixing ourselves up with the discordant politics of Moulmein, having the highest respect for the abilities and energy of the new Commissioner, and scarcely less esteem for friends whom his measures may affect. Festina lente ought always to be the motto of every functionary, whether supreme or subordinate. The putative connection of the Moulmein Chronicle with the Government of the place has been formally dissolved on the ground that the language in which our contemporary sometimes indulged regarding Tharawaddy, being translated to that illustrious prince, served to alienate his minds from the Government with which it was supposed to originate.

— The appointment of Mr. G. R. Clerk, as Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces, is so confidently stated in all the papers that there can no longer be any room to doubt it. A more appropriate appointment could not have been made. Mr. G. Clerk is, by universal suffrage, the ablest public functionary in the North West, and the interests of those provinces could not have been placed in better hands. The appointments which Lord Ellenborough has made are the glory of his administration; not merely because they have been made upon the purest principles, and because all private interest has been sacrificed to public considerations, but because the selections themselves have been so happy, and have reflected so much credit on his Lordship's discernment. Within twelve months from the present time two situations in Council will become vacant, by the retirement of Mr. Bird and Sir W. Casement. It was at one time supposed that Sir Henry Pottinger would have succeeded Sir William, but he occupies too important a post in China to quit it. The claim of no individual stands higher for one of these vacancies than that of Mr. Clerk, and his elevation to the Lieutenant Governorship may also be considered as the precursor of his entering Council.

FRIDAY, JUNE 2.

— The Delhi Gazette reports the receipt of a return which gives the distribution of the Civilians in the Western Provinces, and it stands thus:

|---|---|
| Secretary to Government, | 1 |
| Judges and Register of the Sudder, | 4 |
| Members and Secretary of the Sudder Board, | 3 |
| Special Commissioners for Resumption appeals, | 2 |
| Accountant of the Agra Government, | 1 |
| Civil Auditor, | 1 |
| Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners of Revenue and Circuit, | 8 |
| Civil Judges, | 20 |
| Magistrates and Collectors, | 31 |
| Joint Magistrates and Deputy Collectors, | 32 |
| Assistants to Magistrates and Collectors, | 23 |
| Collectors of Customs, | 4 |
| | 130 |

Thus it would appear that two-thirds of the whole body of uncovenanted servants are employed in collecting the revenue and keeping the peace; and that the important department of Civil Justice is superintended by twenty individuals, being less than a sixth of the whole number, and that not a single Civilian is training up for this important division of labour, excepting the Register of the Sudder Court.

The Hurkaru of this morning alludes to the paragraph which appeared in the Penang Gazette of the 6th May, which announced that a new Steamer of 600 tons and 200 horse power was actually on her way from England to the Straits to be employed in the conveyance of packets and passengers to and from those settlements. Messrs. Mackey and Co. some time since formed a joint Stock Company for the construction of such a vessel, and a recent mail informed us that she was on the stocks; but it must be twelve if not eighteen months before she arrives, and by that time the new vessel will have secured all the patronage of the Straits.

— The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette says, that the total number of those who have registered themselves as Emigrants to the Mauritius is 530. Yet in the same paper we are informed that the Menteur had already sailed with 294, and that the Auguste Jessie was to sail on that day the 23d, and to take no fewer than 910 emigrants. This must be a misprint. But it is evident that the number of emigrants from Bombay is not inconsiderable. Altogether we should think that 6000 must have gone already from the three ports. Yet the planters are crying out about the hardness of the times. Before Coolies were conceded to them, it was the want of labour which affected the prosperity of the Colony; now there are labourers in abundance sent; yet the depression of trade has not ceased.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3.

— The Tenasserim Steamer has at length arrived. Many fears were entertained for her safety, owing to a very foolish report spread by the Bombay papers that she parted from the Cleopatra in a gale of wind and had not reached Aden when that vessel left it.

— By the Tenasserim information has been received of the safe arrival of the Hindoostan Steamer at Aden on the 6th of May, having left Galle at midday on the 20th of April. The only misfortune on board was that their store of ice was exhausted just as they left that port. We who have now been deprived of that necessary of life, for such it may be called, can fully sympathize with our brethren in adversity, though the prospect of soon reaching the "hills and dales of merry old England," may well have compensated for this misfortune.

— The Bombay papers state, that the Semiramis steamer had returned to that port from Kerachee where she landed part of the Highlanders. The weather, which at this season of the year is expected to be very boisterous, was exceedingly favourable to their landing. The sea was smooth, and no inconvenience was experienced.

— The Madras Spectator of the 20th of last month informs us that that day was the limit for paying up the Capital of the Chartered Bank, and that not the least doubt was entertained, that the whole sum of thirty lakhs of Rupees would be paid before the period expired.

— The Dooab Canal, one of the greatest and most important public works projected since we acquired the sceptre of India, is said by the Delhi Gazette, to be nearly at a stand for want of funds. The work was suspended when Government was obliged to resort to a public loan; but we were subsequently informed that a sum of Two lakhs had been appropriated to it. Whether this sum is exhausted, or whether the payment of it is withheld, we are not told; but from whatever cause the suspension arises, it is greatly to be deplored. The vacuum created by the Affghan war in our finances is rapidly filling up. And with a generous confidence in the future resources of India, his Lordship might order 50,000£ to be devoted to it with perfect safety.

— The port of Madras has been visited by a very heavy gale. It appears to have commenced on the 20th of May, when all the vessels in the roads slipped their cables and stood out to sea. They were all more or less damaged; but the Union brig has been totally lost with four of her crew. By dint of great exertion from pumping and throwing cargo overboard, she was kept afloat until the 24th, when fortunately while in a sinking state, the Helen hove in sight and made towards her, just in time to save the Commander and crew from a watery grave.

— An astrologer of great reputation at the Court of the Muh. Rajah Shere Sing has, we are told, recently arrived in Calcutta from Lahore. He had several opportunities of seeing Lord William Bentinck, Sir Alex. Burnes, Sir W. Macnaghten, Sir C. Wade, Mr. Clerk and others. His extensive knowledge of astrology has induced many learned pundits and many merchants to visit him in our metropolis. On Saturday last, he had an interview with the Hon. Mr. Bird, and was received with every mark of courtesy.

— We have copied from the Delhi Gazette a very interesting statistical report of the city drawn up by the Cutwal, which does great credit to his industry. The population which was wont to be estimated at 500,000, is brought down by actual reckoning to 130,662, of whom 66,503 are Hindoos, and 64,157 Mahomedans. The number of Hindoo Schools is 91; of Persian 29.

MONDAY, JUNE 5.

— The Star of yesterday mentions a fact, of which we have been some days in possession that, Mr. George Thompson has accepted the post of envoy from the Emperor of Delhi to Queen Victoria, before whom he is to lay a statement of the grievances under which his Majesty labours. The Star states, the monthly allowance at One Thousand Rupees; and the travelling expenses from Calcutta to Delhi, and from Delhi to London, at three Thousand Rupees. We have heard them fixed at Twelve Thousand. We hope Mr. Thompson will take the precaution of having a better guarantee for the remuneration than his Majesty's word. Raja Rammohun Roy was thus employed by the descendant of Timur under a solemn engagement for the payment of a specific sum. His son was long a suitor at the Imperial Durbar for the sums due to the Raja, but he sued in vain, and the money, as far as we can learn, has never been paid to this day.

— The papers of this morning give full particulars of the voyage of the Tenasserim, and of the reason, of her protracted voyage. It arose from defects in her boilers which, though of copper, and though placed in her only eighteen months ago, are very faulty. This is very surprizing; good copper boilers ought to last five years without repairs. The copper boilers of the Diana steamer when condemned some time ago, were found perfect, though they had been in use twenty years.

— The Englishman has taken up the subject discussed by one of our correspondents last week, relative to the navigation of the rivers; and recalls to mind that the Government receive two lakhs of Rupees for keeping open the navigation of the rivers, and expend one fourth of that sum on the undertaking. Yet the rivers are closed nearly half the year; and we believe our contemporary is perfectly right in saying, that if no efforts were made by Government the navigation would be equally open. At any rate, the toll ought to be reduced to the level of the expenditure.

— The Delhi Gazette of the 27th states that the Ameer Shere Mahomed had taken up a position four marches to the north of Hydrabad with 10,000 men, and that Sir C. Napier intended to do battle with him as soon as the European reinforcements arrived.

— The Hurkaru publishes letters from Ferozepore, which state that Captain Thomas, the Political Agent at Bhowalpore had succeeded in lowering the duties levied on commerce both by land and water. Where ten Rupees were formerly taken on each camel and twenty Rupees on each hackery, the sum now taken is, in the one instance One Rupee, in the other, Two Rupees.

TUESDAY, JUNE 6.

— The last number of the Christian Intelligencer states, that two girls removed from a Protestant School to the Loretto House, have been removed from thence because an attempt was made to proselyte them. These facts were stated in a letter to us a week or two ago by a correspondent, who signed himself a Protestant, but we did not feel ourselves at liberty to publish them, partly because the letter was not authenticated, partly because we thought it indelicate to implicate the parents of the children without their consent in any discussion which the publication of the fact might involve.

— The Englishman has published with his issue of this morning a lithographed representation of the Company's Medallion of Sir Isambert Brunel, supported by one of the Tunnel excavators, the figure of Brunel himself as he appeared during his progress through the Tunnel, and the ceremony of opening the Tunnel, which has immortalized his name. The head is a noble Roman head and bears a strong resemblance to some of the busts which stand in the marble hall at Government House.

— The last intelligence from Scinde is contained in the Gentleman's Gazette, just received from Bombay. The large army of 10,000 men which Shere Mahomed was said to have assembled within two or three marches of Hydrabad, and with which he was to do battle a third time with Sir Charles Napier, for the cause of religion, has dwindled down to 3000 men, and they are said to be in the vicinity of Sukker, and to be pursued by Ali Morad, a chief favourable to our interests. The Scindian and Belochee chiefs are said to be daily sending in proposals for terms, and are anxious to live with us on terms of peace.

— Capt. Biden, the Master Attendant at Madras, has just issued a very valuable paper, containing instructions to Captains of ships, going up the English channel. He explains fully the cause of the melancholy loss of the Reliance and the Conqueror, and gives such an ample description of the French coast, of the dangers to be avoided, and the lights by which the dangers are indicated, as cannot fail to prove highly useful to all those who have occasion to navigate the Channel.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7.

— The Hurkaru informs us that the Rajah Rajnarayun Roy, who has got a young Dhurma Subha at Andool, is getting up an address of thanks to Lord Ellenborough for his consideration to the Hindoos in the matter of the Somnauth Gates. We believe, this is the same Rajah who was brought before the Supreme Court for maltreating an Editor. He had much better let the matter alone. Neither the subject nor the individual can be peculiarly gratifying to his Lordship.

— The Bombay Times states, that Capt. Harris, who recently returned from an embassy to Abyssinia, where he resided for nearly two years, was instrumental in liberating more than seven thousand slaves. He is now on his way to England with a large collection of rare curiosities from that country.

— The Agra Ukhbar states, that Lord Ellenborough would willingly have put off the party he had got up at Agra, for the Queen's birth day; but that it would have been an acknowledgement of his feeling sore. Every one, says that journal, knew that his Lordship had received a mortification in his Government, and they felt uneasy at the party; but he exerted himself, and as if by magic dispelled this feeling and raised the spirits of his guests, and every thing went off with great eclat.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

MISSIONARY AND ECCLESIASTICAL MOVEMENTS.

The Bishop of Calcutta and party arrived at Calcutta on Friday the 12th May, after a tedious voyage from Bombay. The following candidates for the ministerial work were ordained by the Bishop at the Cathedral, on the 25th of the same month. The Rev. Messrs. Macallum and Prochnow as deacons—the former is to labor at Bhagulpore in connection with the Clergy Aid Society. The latter amongst the Hill Tribes at Rajkote, near Simla, in connection with the Simla Mission.—Rev. J. Haeberlin, D. D. has reached Simla in improved health.—Messrs. Johnstone and W. Dawson were set apart to the Missionary work in connexion with the London Society's Mission in the Madras Presidency, at Vizagapatam, during the month.—We announce with regret the deaths of Mrs. Comstock of the American Baptist Mission, on the 23th of April, and of Mrs. Simons, of the American Baptist Mission, at Tellichery, on the 3rd May. The Rev. W. and Mrs. Buyers were (D. V.) to sail for India on the 15th of May.—Rev. S. Ray, formerly of the London Society's Calcutta Mission, died recently in America.—Rev. T. Jackson of Stockwell, London, we believe, the only surviving founder of the London Missionary Society, died suddenly in the month of March last.—Mrs. Bayne, the wife of the Rev. Mr. Bayne, formerly pastor of the Lál Bazar chapel, has entered into her rest.—The Rev. Messrs. Reuther, Druese and Hubner, of the Berlin Missionary Society, have chosen Ghazipore for their labours. May the Lord bless them and make them a blessing to the people of that interesting and long neglected city.—Cal. Christ. Obs. for June 1843.

THE DOOAB CANAL.

We greatly regret to learn from the Delhi Gazette that the operations for carrying on the only really great public work that has ever been attempted by the British Government of India, has been, not exactly brought to a stop, but so seriously checked and limited as to render them almost useless. We allude to the Duab Canal, a work which if completed would confer eternal honour on those who originated and supported it. The warm interest taken in this matter by the late Governor-General is well known, notwithstanding the demands upon his attention and treasury caused by a continued and expensive campaign. On the arrival of the present Governor-General all proceedings were suspended on the plea of the necessity for applying all the available means of the Government in bringing the war to a close;—this was done, our objects were gained and our troops returned in triumph; peace was proclaimed in Asia, and the Governor-General having no longer any excuse, rendered four lakhs of rupees annually disposeable for carrying on this work. To those interested in the welfare of the country this was a source of satisfaction and rejoicing, but such enjoyment was not to be of long continuance; again has his Lordship changed his mind and as we learn from the Gazette the sum now made available is reduced to two lakhs for the present, a sum so inadequate to the purpose as to be almost useless.

The Gazette alludes to an insinuation that the measure in question meets little favour in his Lordship's eyes because it originated with his predecessor; we do not believe in this exactly, but we do believe no measure which does not originate with himself will ever meet any very warm support from him.—Calcutta Star, June 3.

THE TENASSERIM.

We have arrived here at last in the Tenasserim, after a tedious, and boisterous voyage, which we expected would have been much shorter, on account of the excellent passage she made from Bengal to Suez, but we have had quite a chapter of disasters.

The Cleopatra left Suez at 0 30 P. M. and we at 2 P. M. of the 25th of April, at the time of our leaving, the Cleopatra had at least 6 or 7 miles the start of us. The next morning at 8, she was about a mile a head of us, where she kept sometimes gaining a little, and again losing until 11 A. M. of the 30th of May, when our boiler appeared to fail. At this time the Cleopatra was good 7 miles in our rear. At 5 P. M. she was in advance of us 7 or 8 miles, and about 3 or 4 miles to the west of us; our Engines stopped, and sail was put on the vessel, which might have been seen by those on board the Cleopatra, had they their eyes open, (as she was plainly visible from us with the naked eye, although she had no sail set,) and prevented the apparently wanton report that was inserted in the Bombay Paper. "Fears are entertained that the Tenasserim has gone on shore on some of the reefs in the Red Sea," &c. That paper also says that the vessels parted company in a gale of wind. The wind was so trifling at the time, that a child might have sailed his toy ship. Why then this report of a gale? To increase the fears of relatives or friends of those on board, that might have already been raised enough by her non-appearance at the period she was expected. Concerning the position of the vessels, it is to be hoped the report was not from a sea-faring person; as of the position of the two vessels at the time, (by what I can gather) the Cleopatra was the one nearest to danger. Excuse me if I say that I think editors in generid take hold of these reports too quickly, not considering the unnecessary pain they may give to many.

Fifty-two hours were taken to repair, notwithstanding which we arrived at Aden at 11 P. M. of the 4th of May, only 25 hours after the Cleopatra, and 4 hours after her departure from that place. The Clive did not leave Aden to our assistance; there was however a rumour that she was about to do so.

At Aden our Boilers again burst on starting on the 5th, and we were detained till the 8th. At eight P. M. when we started fair once more, all went on tolerably well till midnight of the 15th, when away went the boiler again, which took till the 19th. At 5 P. M. about 100 miles west of the Maldives the next day, it commenced blowing and raining with a heavy sea, and I believe the barometer very low; and when off Galle, it was blowing a perfect gale with such a sea that no one on board could get any rest. We passed Galle and went into Trincomallee, which place we reached 4 P. M. of the 24th. We heard here of the wreck of a Brig at Colombo on the 20th instant. After having taken in some coal, we left on the 26th at 2 P. M., and had it tolerably comfortable, though very threatening till we arrived at Madras at 8 A. M. of the 28th. After taking in the coal and some timber, we left at 6 P. M. same day, and it commenced again to blow from S. W. with a heavy sea, with which it was impossible for any one to rest in any way, till we arrived at the Sand Heads yesterday afternoon at 1 P. M., off which we had lain to near 24 hours.—Here we found no pilots, and only one Pilot vessel, and the weather continuing bad, the Captain ran in to Saugor himself where we arrived at 8. P. M., and proceeded up at daylight this morning, having got a Pilot from a Pilot vessel at Saugor.

We have certainly made a long passage; but when it is considered that out of the 38 days we have been coming, that, through accidents, we have been without steam, and detained by it 9 days and 7 hours, it is not altogether so very bad, as the actual passage, deducting the time, will be 28 days and 17 hours, and we should, in that case, have been only one day after Mail.—Eng. June 5.

STATISTICS OF DELHI.

The following interesting statistical details relating to this city have been prepared by the Kotwal of Delhi, and do credit to his industry.

The city of Delhi, with reference to its police arrangements, is divided into a Kotwallee and 12 Thannas; the duties of which are performed by the Kotwal, and 12 Thannadars, and 148 Burkundazes, besides an establishment of 230 Nujeebs under a Jemadar, two Naibs and 14 Duffadars. These are all paid by the Government. There are also 450 Chokeydars who are paid out of the city funds, and may be described in the same category with the almost extinct class of parish watchmen at home. The number of gates usually mentioned in all books by travellers, tourists and Gazetteer writers, copying one from another is seven, but in reality eleven; of which we give the names: the Kashmeeree, Lahore, Kabulee, Buddurnao, Ajmeeree, Toorkomanee, Delhi, Rajghat, Negumbod, Lall and Kaila. The last four are on the river face.

The number of streets within the walls is 377; of these eleven are described as main streets; they have 246 Mahomedan Mosques, 140 Hindoo Temples and 23,462 dwelling houses, of which 17,564 are of sufficiently solid materials to entitle them to be called pukka. The register of shops shews 9,720, of which, however, only 7662 are occupied by dealers. The number of inhabitants is 130,652 upsetting the magnificent calculations which have, in several instances, stated the population of Delhi at not less than 500,000. Of these 66,503 are Hindoos, and 64,157 are Mussulmans. The inhabitants of the Palace are not included in this census, but they cannot be numerous as almost every servant of the actual residents passes the night with his family in the town, returning to his duties in the morning. Of the Hindoos 24,337 are men, 24,311 women, 9,868 boys, and 7,787 girls. Of the Mussulmans 21,865 are men, 23,313 women, 10,080 boys and 8,890 girls. The number of bankers of note is stated at 50, and that of celebrated physicians, a class of persons in high estimation with the natives of all castes, 21. There is a column in the return furnished to us, set apart for the number of noblemen residing in Delhi, but it has not been filled up. There are 91 Hindee and 29 Persian schools; 31 burial grounds, two public serais, and lastly 607 wells, of which 52 only yield good water, that in the remaining 555 being brackish and bad. Of extensive gardens the number is ten.

It would be very satisfactory if similar returns could be obtained of the principal towns throughout the country, as they would tend to bring our notion of the population of Hindostan to something within the bounds of reality. It is not so long since the inhabitants of Calcutta itself were currently set down at nothing less than 800,000 souls, though later, and more accurate, calculations have reduced the real number to less than one third. The number of inhabitants in most of the large towns has been greatly overrated, and it would be satisfactory to obtain something like accuracy, which could easily be accomplished as in the present instance, by means of the police authorities. We have, in addition to the above valued statistical details, been promised others shewing the division of labour, the number of traders, merchants and other particulars which will prove interesting and shall be laid before our readers as they are communicated to us.—Delhi Gazette, May 24.

MR. BLUNDELL.

The H. C. Steamer, Enterprize, arrived at Amherst on Sunday last, having on board Major Broadfoot, appointed to the Commissionership of these Provinces. He came up to town and landed on Monday under the usual salute. We do not hear that any changes are to take place in the other offices of Government. Mr. Blundell, our former Commissioner, embarked this morning on board the Enterprize, to proceed to Calcutta, and from thence to his appointment as Governor of the Straits. Mr. Blundell's long Commissionership has been a period of great prosperity to these Provinces. Their increase in population, wealth, and revenue, has scarcely a parallel in any other section of the Company's possessions. This condition of the Provinces we believe is owing chiefly to the mild administration of Mr. Blundell, his impartial justice towards all classes of the people, and his habitually kind and considerate demeanor towards the natives of the country, which has impressed them with a sense of security both in person and property, which they never could enjoy under Burmese rule. All his public acts, so far as we have been able to observe them, have had a direct tendency, to give to the people an assurance that the object of his government was their benefit.

The liberal terms which he proposed to the Supreme Government, and which have appeared in the form of a Goverment Notification, on which individuals might possess themselves of large tracts of land for cultivation, the Regulations for the administration of Civil and Criminal justice, and the strong interest which he has manifested in all attempts to promote cultivation, and to develope the resources of these territories, are the proofs of his official regards for the prosperity of the Provinces, and of his desire to attach the native population to the Government under which a great proportion of them have sought refuge from the caprice and oppression of the neighbouring kingdom. The native population, with that feeling of regret which is not in any respect incompatible with the strongest degree of confidence and hope in the well known character of his successor, regard the departure of Mr. Blundell as that of an old and long tried friend, who, both by a sense of official duty and by a familiar knowledge of their language, was ever ready and capable, without the intervention of any one, to make himself fully acquainted with the true nature and character of the complaints of all who sought justice at his hands. We believe there are few public servants who have been so much beloved and respected by the natives under their Government.

and jurisdiction as Mr. Blundell.—Moulmein Chronicle, April 19.

A correspondent at Moulmain writes :—

"Immediately on the arrival of the new Commissioner for these Provinces, Major Broadfoot, the late Commissioner Mr. Blundell left in the Steamer Enterprize viâ Calcutta to assume charge of the Governorship of Penang and Singapore. An address had been prepared by the British, Chinese, Mogul and other Native Merchants and inhabitants of the place, which was to have been presented to Mr. Blundell the same day he left, expressive of the high sense they entertained of his exemplary, unbiassed and conscientious conduct during a period of nearly twenty years he had remained amongst them in various civil situations, and the disappointment in not being able to present this address in consequence of his departure early in the morning, caused so much sorrow to the community in general, that a great number of the respectable native population crowded to his premises, and were just able to see him as he was going to embark—they cried out he had been a kind friend and father to them, and hoped he would come again and live with them, or they would go and live with him at Singapore, and the Chinamen seemed to feel his leaving so much that they declared that they had made up their mind to do so in the event of his not returning.

Mr. Blundell's loss will be long and severely felt in Moulmein. No poor family ever applied to Mr. Blundell for assistance in vain, nor did any industrious tradesman or man of business. To the poor he always gave liberally, and to assist people in business he frequently advanced from 1,000 to 5,000 rupees at a time, for a year or two, free of interest. No wonder then that this gentleman should have been so much beloved and respected; he possessed first rate talents and abilities and the conscientious and straightforward manner in which he was always known to transact his business, rendered him a most valuable public servant, and well deserving of his Government. Hence has arisen the rapid increase of population, both Burmahs, Moguls, Chinese, &c. to these Provinces, and to induce which Mr. Blundell has certainly been most kind in obliging in giving every indulgence to encourage trade any way in his power, and at the present moment Moulmein is in a flourishing condition, and capable of receiving large importations from Europe alone to the amount of twenty lakhs, annually; the Exports are limited almost entirely to teak timber.

It must be confessed here that Mr. Blundell has been most fortunate in selecting so able Assistants to co-operate with him as Mr. Condamine and Doctor Richardson, who are both acquainted from long experience and residence with the country, manners and language of the people, and as Magistrates they are extremely valuable; indeed were it not for their possessing a thorough knowledge of the language, it would require at least double the number of Assistants to get through the business; for I should say there are more causes in the Police alone in Maulmain during the week than there are in the Supreme Court, Court of Request and Police in Calcutta in the same period."—Cal. Star, June 3.

INHUMAN TREATMENT OF FRENCH MISSIONARIES BY THE COCHIN-CHINESE.

In the course of the week the French Corvette L' Heroine, commanded by M. L'Eveque, arrived at this port from Cochin-China, having on board five French Missionaries, belonging to the same society as the Catholic Missionaries already here, by whom they have been hospitably received. These reverend gentlemen are Messieurs Berneux, Galy, Charrier, Miche and Duclos; all five of whom were detained in prison in Cochin-China, loaded with fetters, and suffering the most cruel treatment, when the Heroine, returning from her cruise to China, anchored in Turon Bay, to demand their liberation.

The two first named, Messieurs Berneux and Galy, had been seized on the 11th of April 1841, at a place in western Tonquien, about 480 miles distant from Hue, the Capital of the Cochin-Chinese empire. After being brutally knocked down, they were thrust into a close narrow cage, in which they were carried to the capital, which it took them 50 days to reach; and where they were more than thirty times brought before the tribunals of different mandarins, and repeatedly scourged in the most inhuman manner, the blood springing forth at every stroke, and even the flesh sometimes flying in pieces under the lash. They were moreover threatened to be tortured with red-hot pincers, which were heated in their own presence, and which threat would have been carried into effect, had the judge whose province it is to award this punishment, at the time presided. The Mandarins used every means to compel these unfortunate gentlemen to renounce the religion of which they proclaimed themselves the ministers, and trod under foot the sacred emblem of their faith, which the Missionaries only the more devoutly kissed whenever it was presented to them, while they refused in the most energetic terms to comply. It was then proposed to them that they should marry, under the assurance that on that condition the King of Cochin-China would pardon them for having come into his Kingdom without permission, a proposition which the pious Missionaries rejected with horror. They were at last condemned to death, and sentenced to decapitation in the early part of October, 1841, and to have their heads exposed on the end of a pike in the public Market for the space of three days. The judges were eager to have this sentence carried into execution, but the King made answer to their representation, "they shall die when I desire it." In Cochin-China, no sentence of death can be carried into effect without the sanction of the King himself, and on the present occasion it was supposed by his intended victims that this delay was attributed to certain calculations connected with the operations of the English force in China.

M. Charrier was apprehended on the 6th of October 1841, and like his brethren was put into a cage, in which they kept him for 19 days. He was publicly scourged at the Hall of the prefect, loaded with a heavy cangue, or wooden collar, of forty and a chain of twenty pounds weight, and in this condition was conveyed to the Capital, where he arrived on the 14th of November following. Repeatedly but vainly urged to apostatise he was again cruelly scourged, and in consequence of his refusal and his determined answers to the Mandarins—was condemned about the end of January, 1842, to suffer death by decapitation. The King interposed in his case also, knowing by that time that there were French ships of War on the Coast of China.

Messrs. Miche and Duclos were not seized until the 16th February 1842, in a territory of the Kingdom of Pheu, six days journey from the frontiers of Cochin-China. They were treated as the others, knocked down, deprived of their best clothes, had their hands tied behind their backs, and a heavy cangue round their necks, and after having been four times lashed by the hands of the executioner, they were taken to the capital, still loaded with the wooden collar and heavy fetters. Being here brought before the tribunals, they were again scourged and beaten with rods, in consequence of their refusal to apostatise, and to sign the false account drawn up by the Mandarin of their proceedings, to be laid before the King. These reverend gentlemen were also condemned to decapitation, but as before, the King again postponed the execution of their sentence.

The account given by these French Missionaries of the interrogations they underwent, and the punishments they suffered, contains many curious and interesting details. They were confined in damp dismal cells, on a level with the ground, along with other prisoners, covered with vermin, from which it was impossible to keep themselves free.—Their allowance of food was limited to 20 porringer of rice a month, or rather paddy, as the husk was not removed, without either means to unhusk it, or wood to cook it; so that they would have perished of hunger had it not been for the succour they covertly received from some Native Christians, who found means to bribe the soldiers on guard, and introduce provisions into their dungeon. For the space of nine months they wore the same clothes without being once allowed even to wash them; and M. Miche having one day reproached the Mandarin with having for five months refused the small quantity of rice and the doits, which it is customary to give to the prisoners, the latter had the brutality to reply—"If you have neither rice nor money, eat earth;" and it is to be remarked that they had already robbed Messieurs Miche and Duclos of the money they had on them when apprehended.

The captivity of Messrs. Berneux and Galy lasted 23 months, that of Mr. Charrier 17 months, and of Messrs. Miche and Duclos 13 months, and during the whole time they were each loaded with a heavy chain, which passed round their necks, and hanging down to their middle, when it diverged into two chains, which were fastened round each foot. After they had undergone the cruel punishment of the lash they went forth with a calm countenance, happy at being found worthy to suffer in the name of JESUS CHRIST, and their joy was at its height on being apprised that they were sentenced to die, daily declaring to the Mandarins that they were alike without fear and without crime, and that it would be the happiest hour of their lives when they should be required to shed their blood for the sake of their blessed religion. This fortitude and resignation astonished their judges, as well as all those who witnessed it,—"why do you not cry, why do you not weep when you are beaten," they said to the Missionaries, and they said one to another these strangers probably possess some charms to deaden pain. More than once the Missionaries heard the soldiers, who led them out of the judge's house where they had been beaten and insulted, say of the Mandarins;—"They have themselves more fear than these fathers."

Although the commander of the Heroine had received no directions from his government to effect the liberation of the Missionaries, he took upon himself the responsibility of demanding their surrender in the name of his government and of the French nation, as fellowcountrymen groaning in irons, and whose cries he had heard. He wrote from Turon to the chief Mandarin of the province requiring that the Missionaries should be given up to him, and had an immediate reply to the effect that there were no Frenchmen in Cochin-China. The commander of the Corvette then despatched a second letter in which he mentioned the name of each Missionary, and specified the dates of their seizure; adding the threat that unless his requisition were complied with, he would at once proceed in his vessel to the capital, and there renew his demand in still more energetic language. The Cochin-Chinese Governor no longer persisted in his system of evasion, and after some pretended explanation, he consented to deliver up the Missionaries. On the 12th of last March their fetters were removed; and on the 16th they were sent to the Corvette, the commander of which received them with all the enthusiasm of a fellow-countryman, and lavished on them all the care and attention their sufferings called for. "Now, you are mine, you belong to me," he told them—"Yes. Monsieur le Commandant, we are now at your order. We shall comply with all your wishes," replied the Missionaries. The Corvette had not yet made ready for sailing when a letter came from the Right Reverend Bishop, the Vicar Apostolic of Cochin-China, to the commandant beseeching him to restore his Missionaries to him and land them at Suche, a place southward where a small barque would be found ready to receive them and carry them back to their Mission. M. Leveque was not a little astonished at this demand, but the Missionaries as soon they heard the voice of their Bishop calling them, joined their warm solicitations to those of his lordship, to obtain that favour from the commandant, but this gentleman persisted in his refusal. When they reached Singapore the Missionaries reiterated their eager entreaties, earnestly back by their brothers in Singapore, to M. Leveque that he would be pleased to leave them here at liberty to act juxta dictamenta suæ conscientiæ. But the commandant declared energetically that he would never agree to the proposition, it being his resolution to deliver them to the French government, in the name of which he took on himself the responsibility to claim them from the King of Cochin-China;—nevertheless, after many entreaties he consented to leave in Singapore Messieurs Miche and Duclos, the former being destined by his superiors to superintend the Chinese college at Pulo Penang, and the second suffering much in his health when at sea. Messieurs Berneux, Charrier and Galy are to sail for France in the Heroine. The Missionaries on board the Corvette mess at the table of the Etat Major, and they received from the officers the greatest attention, these gentlemen endeavouring to make them forget their sufferings in Cochin-China. RAILWAYS.

The Statistics of Railways which appear in the publications devoted to the subject are often instructive and interesting, and as a sample of the information so conveyed, the following connected with traffic is given:—It is stated that the Birmingham Railway, 112½ miles in length, produced in the first half-year after it was open throughout 270,000*l*. or 2,318*l*. average per mile; the Grand Junction, 79 miles in length, 119,000*l*. or 1,500*l*. average per mile; the Manchester and Leeds, 50 miles in length, 116,000*l*. or 2,320*l*. average per mile; the Manchester and Liverpool, 31 miles in length, 66,000*l*. or 2,129*l*. average per mile; and the Great Western, 338,000*l*. or 2,000*l*. average per mile. The receipts of the three principal of these railways, comparing the former with those for the last half-year, ending December, 1841, increased on the average 80 per cent., the Birmingham receipts being 429,000*l*., the Grand Junction, 241,000*l*., and the Manchester and Liverpool, 137,000*l*. The cost per mile of these several railways, with the dividends they are now paying, is given as follows:—Birmingham cost per mile 51,842*l*., dividend payable $12\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.; Grand Junction cost per mile 21,259*l*., dividend payable 12 per cent.; Manchester and Liverpool cost per mile 46,281*l*., dividend payable 10 per cent; Manchester and Leeds cost per mile 5,456*l*., dividend payable 6 per cent.; and Great Western cost per mile 53,241*l*., dividend payable 6 per cent.

"The fluctuations in the value of Railway Shares of the years 1837 to 1841," dating the prices on the first day of the quarter of each year, give a pretty good idea of the extent of dealing and estimation in which they are held in the public market:—Bristol and Exeter-shares, in 1837, fluctuated between $3\frac{1}{2}$ and 5, these being the lowest and highest prices; in 1838, they fluctuated between $10\frac{1}{2}$ and 18; in 1839, between 25 and 30; in 1840, between 44 and 76; and in 1841, between 77 and 56; the increase in value being regulated in this, as in other cases, by the payment of calls, &c. Eastern Counties, in 1837, fluctuated between 2 and $2\frac{1}{4}$; in 1838, between 1 and $6\frac{1}{4}$; in 1839, between 7 and $8\frac{1}{2}$; in 1840 between 16 and 10, and in 1841, between 9 and $7\frac{3}{4}$. Edinburgh and Glasgow, in 1838, fluctuated between $4\frac{1}{2}$ and $9\frac{1}{2}$; in 1839, between 7 and 10; in 1840, between 11 and 30; and in 1841, between 30 and 30. Grand Junction, in 1837, fluctuated between 158 and 180; in 1838, between 208 and 191; in 1839, between 204 and 194; in 1840, between 205 and 253; and in 1841, between 212 and 198. Great Western, in 1837, fluctuated between 46 and 65; in 1838, between 67 and 91; in 1839, between 78 and 60; in 1840, between 60 and 83; and in 1841, between 91 and 77. Brighton, in 1837, fluctuated between 8 and $1\frac{1}{4}$; in 1838, between 4 and 11; in 1837, between 9 and 17; in 1840, between 17 and 29; and in 1841, between 44 and $46\frac{3}{4}$. Greenwich, in 1837, fluctuated between 21 and 15; in 1838, between $15\frac{1}{2}$ and 17; in 1839, between 17 and 14; in 1840, between 13 and 7; and in 1841, between $8\frac{1}{2}$ and $7\frac{1}{2}$. Blackwall, in 1837, fluctuated between $1\frac{1}{2}$ and 1; in 1838, between $2\frac{1}{2}$ and $5\frac{1}{4}$; in 1839, between 6 and 10; in 1840, between 13 and $21\frac{1}{2}$; and in 1841, between 18 and $9\frac{3}{4}$. Liverpool and Manchester, in 1837, fluctuated between 218 and 200; in 1838, between 195 and 205; in 1839, between 204 and 190; in 1840, between 183 and 186; and in 1841, between 185 and 198; and Birmingham, in 1837, fluctuated between 146 and 101; in 1838, between 158 and 178; in 1839, between 179 and 140; in 1840, between 142 and 189; and in 1841, between 172 and 154.—Birmingham Gazette.

RELIGIOUS.

THE RELIGIOUS OPINIONS OF THOMAS CARLYLE, (Continued).—"Thus our literature and our ethics partake largely of the superficial, calculating spirit of the age. Few think deeply; fewer feel deeply. We boast of the 'march of intellects,' of the 'progress of the species.' Apparently, in many respects it is so. But man's spiritual nature suffers. There is no faith but in things which can be seen, and handled, and enjoyed. It is a sickly growth. There is activity, but it is a self-conscious, a frenzied activity, and not a healthy activity. There is a mania to be popular in literature and religion, as well as in politics. Take a single fact:—your pretty story-telling Walter Scott, who threw off his volumes like leaves in autumn, is greedily read, and is called great; for a long time the greatest. It required no thought to read him; the intellect was not taxed in the least. Scott did not speak to the inner soul of man; he did not interrogate the depths of being, and bring forth responses from the eternal oracle. Not he! He knew the age, and he wanted a wand;—he wrote, for he knew he should receive wages and applause."

So much upon the lamentations of Carlyle. It would be difficult to say less, and yet give a clue to his way of thought upon some of those subjects, in writing upon which the religious aspect of the man comes in sight.

Let us now, in the same manner, see how Carlyle views men—men who have been distinguished. His classification of men is peculiar, whether of individuals or of nations. Their religion, or their "no-religion," is his chief mark of distinction. But by religion he means vastly more than is usually meant to be conveyed by this term; but he plainly tells us what he means. With him, that is a truly religious man, who has a soul to see and to feel the true, the beautiful, the good, the poetical, in everything. Isaiah, Paul, Mahomet, Luther, Knox, Bunyan, Fox, Göethe, Burns, are perfect models of spirituality, of true heavenly piety. What are commonly called sins—for example, the sins of such a man as Burns, go for little with Carlyle; over them he drops a tear and utters notes of pity; but he excuses. For such men had heavenly spirits; they were sincere; they saw the deep things of God in every emblem of God; and they had fire within them to burn out some of the sins of the world.

"Burn's soul was musical—in perfect harmony with nature—a true Æolian harp, which, as touched with the breezes of heaven, gave forth the sweetest sounds. He was poor; he had to guage beer-barrels for his daily bread; he loved liquor and good cheer; he felt degraded by his employment; he was tempted, he fell. We will weep over him, for we love him; and denounce the irreligious age that so received one of the choicest gifts of heaven. His sun shone as through a tropical tornado, and the pale shadow of death eclipsed it at noon. Tears lay in him and consuming fire, as lightning lurks in the drops of the summer cloud.

"Mahomet, though he had faults, (as who has not?) and though in some respects he had wrong notions, and did wrong acts, was a true heaven-sent prophet He possessed the mild Arab heart, ardent, clear-seeing. He saw the world given to the worship of mere forms and dead images. He saw the Catholic Church corrupt and idolatrous. He saw, also, that there was reality in man and in nature; and he mourned over the sensual, hollow worship around him. He had deep thoughts and feelings; his imaginations was enkindled—he burned with holy desire to impart his feelings to others. He told his wife—she assented; he felt encouraged—became intensely absorbed—felt impressed by a higher power to do something to enlighten and bless his benighted race. When he felt clear upon anything that had agitated his mind, he considered it as a revelation from heaven. And thus, for twelve hundred years, he has been the spiritual guide of millions. And knowing that men then and there were the same as ourselves, we cannot suppose they would have believed, lived by, and died by, what was wholly so essentially a lie. Grant that his religion was faulty; but it supplanted one more faulty. Did he take the sword? Let the sect that has been without fault in this respect cast the first stone at the Arab prophet!

"Luther saw errors and shams similar to those which Mahomet saw. He was a sincere, strong-souled man, ready to do battle for truth against kings, and popes, and all earthly powers. He lived at too late a period of the world to be deemed a prophet, much less a god. The day is passed when the great man will be esteemed, either by his own or succeeding generations, a deity, or even as one directly sent of God. As a priest, he was found faithful in declaring God's will to the people. No dumb dog this! Like all great heroic souls, he would have been content, peaceably and in silence to feed his flock with the sincere milk of the word. He did not covet, he dreaded public warfare with the world around him. But tell my people a lie? Never! by God's help, never!"

Of Christ, Carlyle directly says little or nothing. In one or two instances he appears to start awe-stricken at the very mention of his name, as though nothing but sacred silence became us when the mind rested upon him. In several places he calls him the "Divine Man," the "God-Man;" and phrases of this import are often applied. But unless one is determined to see nothing out of the way in this writer, it must be evident, from all his indirect allusions to Christ, that he views him as a prophet in the same sense he considers Mahomet a prophet. He would deem Christ decidedly, almost immeasurably, greater than any other character. "He was not nearer right than other prophets and great men, but he was wholly right. He saw clearly into the eternal truth of all things which pertain to man's spiritual nature and destiny. He spoke to the inner souls of men. His words were from the heart, and they reached the heart. His Gospel was triumphant, for it was true; men could see its truth, and truth seen will do its work of enlightening and reforming. All systems owe their success, as far as they have any, their truth, and not to their error. No wonder, then, that the Gospel has done more for the world than any other published religion" We doubt not Carlyle would say all this, and much more, in favour of Christ. The fact that he applies to him the epithets of Divinity, in itself, proves nothing either way. Epithets of this kind are showered bountifully upon numerous individuals in his writings. We must look at the leading features of his belief; and unless we can find him inconsistent with himself, (and we are confident we cannot,) it would be utterly impossible to weave our belief respecting Christ into Carlyle's system of faith. He would heartily laugh at such an attempt.

The question has often been asked, "Why, since Carlyle is so independent a writer, and since the subject of religion, in some form or other, is always in view, why has he not told us, in so many words, what he thinks of Christ, if his opinion here is peculiar?" A fair question, and we shall attempt an answer. Carlyle does not wish to disturb the mind upon this subject. He knows that men will have some system of religion; he knows and feels that the Christian system, with Christ for its centre, is the best, the only one for civilized society. And he knows another thing; that the great mass of men have neither the ability nor the inclination to examine that kind of reasoning which he would use; and hence he would consider that only evil could result from laying violent hands upon the commonly received opinions of Christ and his Gospel. He would have Christ revered a thousand-fold more than he now is. It is one of his burdens that men do not see more that is good and god-like in all great men. And there is so little thought in respect to the great mystery of being, that there must be both the exoteric and esoteric doctrines; and did men desire it, it would be impossible to initiate the greatest portion. Let the sensuous, statute system stand open for the reception of all; and as fast as they can bear it, let them take the maximum gradum into the full effulgence of the sun of Transcendentalism.

We believe that Carlyle would deplore the licentious opinions which his writings are generating. And if he kept the keys of his spiritual temple, he would not admit into its holy of holies one-half that are rushing in; and we are sure he would turn out, as too unholy and sensual, some who are profaning it by their presence. He does not wish to pull down, but build up; this is apparent both in his political and religious opinions. But some of his admirers, being unequal to the task of building up with such ethereal materials, and anxious to show their earnestness to work, will do nothing but pull down. Animals know when the proper season for moulting comes; Carlyle would have men as wise, and not set about violently rending asunder their old "garments" till new ones were formed beneath. Neither the snake nor the eagle is guilty of such folly! He would say to his adherents, "If you are initiated—truly converted, you will be content to enjoy your heavenly visions in silence: do not disturb those who are not worthy of receiving what is revealed to you; you will do them no good, but injury." In his opinion of Christ, as well as of the natural goodness of the human heart, Carlyle would be classed (if he must be classed at all) among the Unitarians. I think he transcends them—but they claim him, and there is no good ground for disputing the claim.

One other character that finds favour in the eyes of Carlyle must not be omitted: be not astounded, reader, at the incongruity; the man is James Boswell, Johnson's biographer! "Call Boswell as vain as you please, but take care how you sport with him, for he had a noble vein of spirituality in his nature. Why did he so fawningly follow Johnson, at a time when Johnson was a poor, obscure, ill-fed, ill-favoured man? The answer is plain, if you have an eye to see it; he saw, at a time when no other man did see, Johnson's greatness. Boswell had reverence in him as well as vanity; and Johnson was in reality the divinest man of his age, and Boswell bowed at his shrine! He only worshipped earlier what all England worshipped at a later day. As a spiritual man, Boswell was one of the first of the age." It would help us in coming to a correct view of Carlyle's "spirituality," to dwell upon particular individuals concerning whom he has uttered his anathemas; but space will admit of only a word. Byron finds no favour in his sight; for while Byron had talents, "he was only a sickly sentimentalist; his heart was of gall; he did not embrace nature with a warm bosom; he loved nothing that was truely lovely; he hated nothing which deserved hating. All the strings of his heart were ajar—dissonance and not melody was the result. He was sincere in nothing. His music stirred, but did not soften and cheer the soul. Beauteous, bountiful, loving nature had no smiles and no blessings for this fallen spirit. He never ascended into the mystery of being farther than to doubt and despair. Reverence, sincere, earnest worship found no place in poor Byron's heart."

Napoleon is admitted with reluctance into his calendar of great men. "We will call him a hero of a low order; for while he had insight into the realities of things, and saw clearly the difference between a something and a no-thing; while, too, there was red earnest in the man, yet he lacked sincerity—the cardinal quality for a truly heroic man. He became ambitious—too self-conscious, and on the whole had better be consigned to the list of fighting captains"

The class called "gentlemen" comes into his writings for sportive illustrations, or to receive the lashes of irony, and is then dismissed. These, and that species of the human race named "dandies," he considers quite a useless and profitless part of God's creation. The hard-handed, thinly-clad, and scantily-fed day-labourer is infinitely superior and more worthy of our regard. His sympathies are with the poor and the suffering. To see how he handles political demagogues, and all who strive to be noticed by the world, would be amusing and instructive, but out of place here.

Carlyle takes enlarged views of men of all countries, and of all ages; this is a prominent feature of his writings. He is constantly suggesting new trains of thought about men. The thousand different aspects which society has assumed; the habits, the dress, the customs, the forms of religion and civil polity, seen in different ages and nations, are no obstacle to his vision. In his eye, all these are but the outward vesture, and he attempts to strip them all off. Beneath all these he sees the same throbbing heart, the same strong desires, the same hopes and fears that he sees in himself. The written creed of man's religion, the laws of his statute-book, are no part of man—often no true index of what man is. Neither in estimating man as a spiritual being would he have us much regard the advancement of science and literature in his age and country, not too rigidly inquire whether he worships in a mosque, pagoda, cathedral, or meeting-house, or in no house at all. The one great, almost sole inquiry should be: What does man sincerely believe concerning this universe, and his duty and destiny in it? Know this, and we know what is most worth the knowing about the man or nation. Now, Carlyle would consider that nation truly religious, (faulty as its religion might be,) which had a sincere, soul-stirring worship; and worship with him is the deep emotion of admiration and wonder. It is the same in kind, whether felt in view of a man or a mountain, a flower or a star, a king, priest, pope, or God. "Did Boswell stand in awe before the giant intellect of Johnson? Did he admire, did he wonder? then did he worship! Did the ancient Icelander have the same emotions looking at an iceberg? No wonder, then, it was to him a God! Does the beautiful lily of the standing pool excite the like feelings in the soul of the poet? This is the purest devotion! Was Zoroaster awe-stricken as he looked up to the burning orb of day? How should he feel otherwise than that a God was looking down upon him? Was not the ancient Persian right in feeling that every star was an eye of Deity? and, if he felt this, should he not have done homage? If the Norwegians viewed Odin so much greater than themselves, are we not to commend them for making him a god? that is, for looking upon him with infinite wonder. Even the heartless superficiality of our own time has left a remnant of devotion for those we highly value. Oh that men would think deeper! descend beneath the surface of things, and not be deceived and befooled by mere semblance, and formulas, and creeds which are only the outer garment of realities. Simpleton, can you not see the difference between a bit of cloth and a god-inspired soul? Will you call that rich, sensual, tinselled bishop, who divides his time between hunting excursions into Scotland, and feasting and riding about in his gig at home; who fleeces but never feeds his flock; will you call him a religious man, destined for heaven, because you occasionally see him pompously going to a Christian church; and consign to eternal night and Orcus the Mussulman, who with a burning, wrapt soul, five times a day most devoutly kneels to Allah? Will you for ever be calling that heathenism and a lie, deserving damnation, which lead its devotee to consecrate all upon its altar, and with a wonder transcends all your logic, bows before some idol of nature while those who, with sleepy heads and lifeless spirits, meet in a framed house, and go over a different set of forms, are the only elect of God? Clear thy mind of cant! Does not God look at the heart? But you say, 'Other nations worship false gods,' Very true; they have many erroneous ideas of God; but be assured the image you see is not the thing they worship. They use this only as an aid to the mind; and cannot we believe that their idea of God, in many cases, is as near the reality as the ideas men called Christians form of him? Bethink yourself! what is a man's god? is it not the thing he thinks most of, loves most the thing he wonders at and admires most? If you will look at the subject, you will find as great a diversity of gods in London as in Calcutta or Pekin! The Burmese worship Gaudama; now drop the name, which, is a nothing and look at the real thing which they worship. You will find this to be a great, good being, who formerly ruled their ancestors, and gave them great blessings, for which they are 'thankful.' You say, 'The Hindoo worships the Ganges.' Not exactly so. It is not so much water, so much oxygen and hydrogen, but a living spirit that enriches their rice-fields, that he worships; and is it not the true religious soul which sees God in his works? The origin of all you call heathen idolatry was nature-worship—a recognition of God in everything; a God who gave them fruitful land, refreshing showers, a cheering sun, and a spangled heaven. They embraced nature as a kind, and loving, and fruitful mother they loved her sincerely, ardently; they admired, they wondered, they worshipped. They had not, as we moderns have foolishly attempted to do, explained everything; given to this and that some long scientific name, and then called it understanding nature; and so ceased to wonder. Science is good, but the soul cannot live upon such bread alone! In child-like simplicity and faith, primitive people looked upon all things; they saw God in all things, and they bowed down and adored. And what grown child in England—take him from the House of Lords—would not instantly down upon his knees, if with all his science and logic, he was to look, for the first time in his life, upon the sun rising in all his majesty and glory in a clear eastern sky?

"Do you say, 'These nations have now debased themselves by bowing before mere dead matter?' Not to a much greater extent, I answer, than Christian nations. Christianity is far superior to any other religion, it is exactly right; but a dead formulary named Christianity is just as dead a thing as a dead formulary named heathenism. And a spirit moved with devout admiration at God's works in India is just as acceptable to him as though found in England. The fact is, we are not to proceed in this way to know man's spirituality. Do men—does a nation, modern or ancient, here or elsewhere, really feel that they are in God's universe? Do they lay it to heart that God is in them and around them—here and everywhere—looking upon them from the heavens over their heads, from the earth beneath their feet? Is the deep fountain of their souls stirred with wonder, admiration, and love? Find we such men, and whether in Scandinavia or in Great Britain, whether in the first or the nineteenth century, I embrace them as true spiritual brothers. Leave the difference in original talent and advancement in science and civilization out of the question; whenever or wherever you find a soul sincere, earnest, in love with nature; feeling the beauty, the poetry, the truthfulness of nature; standing awe-stricken as in the presence of Omniscience; you find a high, noble existence! I demand that he shall be true man, and not a sham of a man;—one that sees and feels the reality of things, and not the superficial covering of things; and whether he be a Bunyan tinkering his kettles, a Burns delving the earth or guaging barrels, a Quaker Fox cobbling shoes, a Mahomet changing religions, or a Cromwell changing dynasties, I care not; he is my brother; such a soul is inspired in the highest sense of the term. The Memnon statue, which uttered sweetest music when touched with the mellow light of morning, is a true and beautiful symbol of every faithful prophet, poet, and priest. Their light is in the insight of pure reason seeing the 'open secret' of the universe; and touched with this light they give forth music, utter truths in harmony with the eternal principles of nature; and hence the soul of every true man responds. Is not every man, till he becomes dead in the wrappage of forms, something of a poet—of a Transcendentalist? Even so. Probably there never was a human heart that had not at times some touch of the poetical, the beautiful in nature. That emotion was a holy emotion; so far forth he was religious. From Job down to the present time man has looked through nature up to God. As science has advanced, the heart, foolishly enough, has ceased to wonder, until man almost begins to think there is nothing to wonder at. He deceives himself with names, and vainly supposes he sees through it all! Silly fool, he begins to think he could make just such world. In fact, he has actually attempted to make a man and a goose; and fancied he had succeeded with his goose, for it would digest! He collects some of God's elements, puts them together, and calls it making a thing; and then wisely looks around to receive applause for his skill. Ancient people viewed nature as she was—great, animated, wonderful, and reverently bowed before her. David, the Hebrew singer and poet, saw God in everything; all nature was alive to his pious soul, and he called upon mountain, river, tree, and flower, to paise God. 'Let everything that hath life praise him!' All nature was to David what it is to every poetical, religious soul—an Æolian harp breathing the sweetest music, and inspiring the heart with devout rapture. He also, and he only, is the man after God's own heart, who hears this music, who feels this rapture.

"Rather than imitate David, the professed ministers of God at this day try to make men devotional by thundering against all sects but their own; forcing their people to swallow a particular creed—some thirty-nine 'articles of faith,' as they call them; when probably not one in a hundred of their parishioners is capable of understanding these articles, or ever, any more than the Chinese or Mussulman, undertakes, by personal examination, to try to understand what their teachers say about them. So narrowed and prejudiced has the mind of each religious sect become, that it doubts whether there is any spirituality beyond the precincts of its own ecclesiastical forms. They turn their weapons of warfare against each other; accuse each other of error, perversion of Scripture, of being formal and dead; (and really one might say, for the best of reasons, if they only knew it.) The direct aim,—the absorbing subject with each sect, or the leaders of it, is to shape, by crampings and stretchings, sometimes with racks and thumbscrews—tropically at last by way of excommunication and cry of heresy, every mind to fit some pre-established creed, as unintelligible to common minds as the Shaster. Our curates and bishop consider their flocks in a thriving condition, provided they are dumb before the shearer, and drive easily into the fold; whereas, if one, having been sheared too close, shivers with cold, or bleats for greener pasturage, such an one must be warmed and nourished by an ecclesiastical bounding, or die by starvation, if it will continue to feed upon the same dry straw threshed for the thousandth time. Spiritual leaders do not lead their flocks by still waters and into green pastures;—give them the sincere milk of the word that they may grow thereby. They are made to digest, at least to swallow and ruminate, the tough beef of knotty logical points of theology; doctrines which have been decided and rescinded some hundred times from Augustine down to Elizabeth. Hence, instead of burning hearts impressed with the infinite nature of duty, and crying out, 'What shall we do to be saved?' as in apostolic days, our houses of worship are filled with listless minds and unfeeling hearts. Would that thou wert either cold or hot! thou art neither, therefore I will spue thee out. Better than so, give me the wild savage, who, though uncultivated, rough, and looking through strangely diffractive media, sees a great Spirit in the heavens above, in the silent forest, the brook, the flower, and everything around him; and hears his voice sweetly whispering to him in every breeze."

We have thus endeavoured to exhibit the light in which Carlyle views certain things which bear upon our subject. Without much circumlocution, we saw no other way of doing this than the one the reader has seen;—not by an attempt to imitate his style, (this be folly,) but by giving some of his thoughts in a very concise form, and somewhat in his spirit and language. Those who have read his works will bear testimony to the veracity of our statements: we have certainly aimed to give a true view of the writer's thoughts, as far as our limits would permit. Extracts could have been made; but isolated passages from Carlyle would be very unsatisfactory as proof, for in this way anything could be proved respecting him; the plan we have taken was more laborious, but better for our present purpose.

Having looked at the religious aspect of certain objects through the Carlyle's medium, we think we can pretty confidently state what he is not, if we find it difficult to define what he is. Much of his writings would seem to show him a most sincere believer in a Divine revelation, and a Christian of the truest, warmest heart. Other passages, together with the whole tenor and spirit of his thoughts in any way bearing upon what is usually termed religion, conclusively show that he is not what the Christian world generally would consider a true believer.

What, then, are Carlyle's religious sentiments? Is he a Pantheist? Is he a Transcendentalist? Infidel? Atheist? Deist? Has he betaken himself to the mysticism of Plato? All these inquiries have been made. It would be easy to prove, by detached passages from his several works, that he is either or all of these; and as easy, but the same process, to prove he is neither. The fact is, we cannot make a Procrustean bed of this sort, and then, by stretchings or clippings, make Carlyle fit it. Shall we call him a religious Eclectic? This is too indefinite for our purposes, although there would be truth in the term. Is he aiming to form a new sect? One would judge otherwise from reading him: certainly that he had no purposes of this kind. Yet indirectly this may be the result. Says the review, quoted in the fore part of this article, "Good or bad, Mr. Carlyle's thoughts will be largely adopted within the next twenty years." This cannot apply less to his religious than to his political views.

In respect to the nature of God, of Christ, the inspiration of the Scriptures, religious worship, the sanctions of the Divine law, miracles, regeneration, and kindred topics Carlyle most manifestly differs from the commonly received opinions. And his views upon these subjects are so expressed, and artfully commingled with them is so much that is true, forcible, sublime, and beautifully as to render him of all writers, of all ages, the most fearfully dangerous to what has been considered orthodox Christianity. After what has been said, we are prepared somewhat more definitely to state his views upon these points.

The common and the scriptural view of God in Christian communities is this, viz.:—A Person who governs, and not a principle working in nature or nature itself; a Being of intellect, susceptibility, and will; separate from his physical creation, rather than identical with it. Not poetically, figuratively, or in any mysterious transcendental sense, a person, but in reality. He knows, he sees, he feels. He is the Lawgiver, the Ruler, and the Judge of his intelligent creatures, a Being who is pleased with the wrong moral conduct of men. Now Carlyle often receives him as such, but only in a figure. To give force to his thoughts, poetical beauty to his beautiful expressions, Carlyle often endows his God with all the attributes of the Jehovah of the Jews. But his God is a principle; an all-pervading an all-mighty, infinite IT! Except for poetical and rhetorical purposes, nothing more. And in several instances we have found men in the ordinary labours of life, eating of this same spiritual food, ground for their consumption in certain mills for the purpose.

Of Carlyle's view of Christ we have already spoken. He believes the Bible inspired, in the same sense that the writings of Dante or Shakspeare are inspired.

All thought that is true to nature (and Carlyle means much by this) is inspired thought. Whenever a man's genius is beyond common, and utters true, good, poetic thoughts, he says we call it ethereal, heavenly, inspired; it is beyond us, we cannot fathom it, and therefore we give it some *super*natural quality.

All discussion upon what is termed the "plenary inspiration of the Bible" he considers folly, and treats it with a degree of contempt. "The soul of man is plenarily inspired, and this should suffice."

He treats what he terms the "logic proof" of Christianity in the same way. "Man's pure reason* will see not only so much farther into the hidden realms of truth, but is adapted to provinces where the understanding will essay in vain to penetrate; hence the believer, if he understand his ground, will never descend to any fencing of this sort."

What Carlyle says of worship, and his "Heroes" is full of it, taken by itself, very beautiful and truly excellent. But taken, as it surely will be, in connexion with all other kindred topics, its tendency is to make the mind satisfied with a very refined species of idolatry. We have already, perhaps, said enough upon this subject. He often defines worship to be "wonder"—"wonder infinite," to whatever object rendered. How easy would it be to name devout men according to Carlyle's notions of devotion, whom the Christian world has had the best of reasons for not considering religious.

He quotes Scripture phrases with much significance, often happily. Bible languaged, as is the language of all other books ever written, is familiar to him. "Winged words" are his vocations, and no man ever had more, or better for effect. Milton's imagery of Paradise is none too strong for him to express the rapturous feelings of the devout soul; nor Dante's imagery of hell to express the agony of remorse. Upon this subject he has most forcibly uttered what every Universalist minister is for ever trying to utter; and many a profitable pearl will this class of religious pearl-divers fetch up, together with sea-weed and mud in abundance, from these prolific waters. In a tropical sense, Carlyle believes all the poets and prophets say about heaven and hell. He makes life a most serious concern to mortals; words were rarely ever put together with more appalling force in favour of right, and in opposition to wrong. Here his notes are the clearest, the strongest, and the most imperative. He throws around the lowest, as well as the highest of mortals, an infinitude, and would make him feel the full weight of his responsibility. Would that there was nothing to counteract the impression.

Upon a future state, he is so Unitarianly general in his forms of expression as to make it difficult to state with much confidence, his belief. Here he so transcends as to leave him in Platonic, or German fog, out of sight of those who yet live in "time and space." We judge, however, that when this "phantasm of a material body and world" shall vanish, he supposes we shall enter upon a higher state; or then the present "apparent parts" of the "universal all" will be more or less happily united.

Upon miracles, nothing but the style is Carlyle's; the thoughts have been often advanced in attempts to answer the arguments in proof of revealed religion.

The account he gives of the "conversion" of his Professor Teufelsdrockh is in keeping with his general theology, and probably was designed to express his view of the doctrine of regeneration. It is the common method of philosophizing upon a most mementous Bible doctrine. No wonder that in speaking as he has upon this, and almost every other subject touching practical piety, he has "spoken to the condition" of so many in New England—particularly in Massachusetts. The Quaker's complaint can cease for some twenty years.

We say what we do know, when we assert that many young men in our seminaries of learning have lost their faith in the Bible, as a special revelation from God, by reading Carlyle. They are captivated by the novelty, the picturesque beauty and sublimity of his thought and diction. His two edged, quaint, and grotesque expressions soon cease to repel, and actually chain the mind as if spell-bound before this literary Circe. Pride of intellect, the love of originality in many cases, prepare the mind for the reception of the erroneous, together with so much that is true and good, in this singular writer. And then few minds, it is apprehended, are entirely and uniformly beyond the precincts of Doubting Castle; and those who indulge much in sceptical trains of thought must be particularly on their guard, or a parley with Mr. Carlyle will prove fatal.

His writings are, and will continue to be, extensively read. He will have admirers, enthusiastic and ridiculous "thaumaturgic" imitators. His uncouthness will offend the tastes of some, and he will be thrown down with the cry—"It is so unnatural,"—"All affectation,"—"A jargon of Germanisms," &c. But he will be read, and he may be read with profit.

* We hardly need say, that Carlyle gives to what is termed the "higher reason," the same province in matters of faith as Kant, Coleridge, &c.

We doubt whether many minds will long continue to be particularly delighted with his peculiarities. The fever will be high, but not continue at its height for a great length of time.

His "French Revolution" stands unrivalled as a series of vivid, glowing pictures of that frightful catastrophe. This is Carlyle's master work, and it can be read with great profit, not only for its history, but for its sound reflections. It is the least objectionable of all his writings, on the score of awakening sceptical trains of thought in the mind of the reader. And we believe the bad influence of all his works might be counteracted in a great measure, particularly among the youth in our colleges and seminaries, by a little pains on the part of the instructors. That words of caution are needed here, is but too manifest.—Congregational Magazine, for Dec. 1842.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE CONDITION OF ENGLAND QUESTION.—What will relieve the national distress? This is the question which now demands consideration with a view to practical result. A year ago, the question was, whether the distress which, even then, was universally admitted to prevail, was temporary and evanescent, or fixed and permanent; but now the honourable and whiskered Member for Lincoln is the only senator bold enough to dispute the too glaring fact, that the distress is wide, deep, and alarming. No man who makes use of his eyes, and pays the slightest attention to evidence, can doubt that tens of thousands of our fellow-subjects, with their wives and little ones, are upon the verge of starvation; and every man feels that such a state of things cannot continue long in a country like this, without the greatest risk to public order, the rights of property, and all the bonds by means of which society is held together.

What, then, will relieve the national distress? Three general answers appear to have been given to this solemn question.

In the first place, a nobleman of high character, respectable talents, and kindly feelings, with a sincere desire to serve his generation, steps forward, and declares it to be his conviction, that the wealthy classes, whether those who derive their wealth from their rents of lands and other real property which have descended to them from their forefathers, or those who owe their affluence to returns from capital invested in the various forms of trade and manufacture, have too generally forgotten the maxim, that property has its duties as well as its rights; and that, through their culpable neglect, the masses of men by whose manual labour and skill alone their material property is rendered productive, have been allowed to remain in ignorance and vice, or, rather, to sink deeper and deeper into habits of gross and unmitigated animalism. With laudable zeal, this virtuous scion of nobility has set himself to remedy the evil which his own freedom from the higher forms of sensuality indulged in by most of his order, has left him at liberty to observe and investigate. Already, through his instrumentality, many of the underground horrors of English Mammonism have been by law abolished; and those which exist among the tillers of the earth's surface are under examination with a view to remedial legislation. In this way would the amiable Lord Ashley inculcate upon the proprietary classes the manifestation of a kind and fellow-creaturely feeling towards their less fortunate countrymen. Crime, however, as well as cruelty, abounds among us; and for that, his Lordship perceives no other cure than the extension of moral and religious Education. He is, doubtless, quite right. Would that the just and efficient application of the remedy were a part of the question on which a satisfactory and unanimous conclusion could as easily be arrived at as on the nature of the remedy itself! But we will suppose Lord Ashley to be in a fair way of achieving both parts of his benevolent purpose,—to have not only succeeded in carrying legislative measures tending to wipe away the reproach, that landlords and capitalists care not for the physical well-being of their work-people, but merely for their own overgrown incomes,—but also to have stimulated the Legislature to the adoption of scheme of Education which, faithfully and efficiently worked out, will ultimately raise the moral character of our population, and banish the grosser forms of ignorance and vice from the shores of England. By doing this, he will have earned for himself honours more illustrious than any he inherits; and he will have conferred a present benefit by softening asperities between the upper and the lower classes, with a prospective benefit of inestimable price. Yet, notwithstanding all, he leaves entirely unanswered the question, What will relieve the national distress? although it presses for an immediate practical reply.

A second answer has been given to this vital question, by several voices at once. We distinguish not between them. What they all say, resolves itself into this—an Extension of the Suffrage. Now, we yield to none in zealous advocacy of the doctrine, that the elective franchise ought to be placed within the reach of a far greater number of persons than it is at present. For this we are ready to contend, as at once a matter of right, of expediency, and of necessity. Many and most important are the Reforms which wait, and which must wait, to be accomplished, until the representation shall be brought into greater harmony with the general opinion of the community than it can be under the present limitation of the franchise and unprotected condition of the electors. The extension of the Suffrage, however, is a question which Reformers are not prepared to urge with the concord, knowledge, zeal, and courage indispensable to success. Meantime, while the grass grows, the steed starves. We have a present evil, which calls for a present remedy. The question is asked, What will relieve the national distress? To answer it by saying, An extension of the Suffrage, though not intended as mockery, would really be nothing better.

The question, therefore, still returns with all its force, What will relieve the national distress? To this inexorable inquiry, a third answer has been given, which appears to us to be the true, the only true one. It is that of the Anti-corn-Law League. That powerful combination and is at once the strongest symptom of the disease, the clearest indication of the appropriate remedy. The only means, under the blessing of Divine Providence, by which our national distress can be relieved is, by the extension of our Trade; and our trade can be extended only by the abolition of those vile monopolies of which the monopoly in Corn is the most vile. We are in this anomalous condition. On the one hand, we have abundance of idle capital and indefinite resources in nature and in art; and, on the other, a starving multitude of skilful and industrious operatives, willing to labour, but without work. What prevents that combination of capital, natural product, mechanical science, and manual labour, of which the result would be, flourishing trade, peace, plenty, and general contentment? Nothing but the preference given by our rulers to the exalted few over the depressed many. Has not that maladroit Tory, the Earl of Mountcashel, plainly confessed, that the only, or at least the principal reason, why the Corn-law is not to be repealed, is because certain great landholders, who, if they were not Peers, might be called insolvents, are the proprietors of none but mortgaged estates, and consequently cannot afford to run the risk of a reduction in rents? And is this a reason which satisfies the mind of Sir Robert Peel? Does he conceive himself placed by Divine Providence in his present responsible situation, in order that he may bolster up a system which enables a spendthrift aristocracy to recruit their dissipated fortunes by perpetual drains upon the very vitals of the general community? The time will come, when he, like many of his predecessors, outliving (and long may he live!) the desire, though not the faculty, we hope, of devoting himself to the public service, will retire to the shades of Drayton-Manor, there to review his past career, and prepare for that eternal future that awaits him. Let him now anticipate that retirement, and ask himself whether it will give peace and tranquillity to his private meditations in his declining years to be haunted by the thought, that, when the choice was before him, of earning the lasting gratitude of the nation by the repeal of restrictive laws which cripple our trade and entail misery and starvation upon a large portion of honest and industrious countrymen, or of compelling the reluctant homage of an Aristocracy who loathe him, by adhering in the last extremity to those iniquitous restrictions, he deliberately preferred the Aristocracy with which he has no sympathies, to the community from which he sprang, the gratification of the few to the benefit of the many, monopoly to justice? Will he not then come to the opinion recorded by Bishop Burnet as expressed by a celebrated man in Charles II.'s who said: "I do not imagine that the Almighty intended that the greatest part of mankind should come into the world with saddles on their backs and bridles in their mouths, and a few ready booted and spurred to ride the rest to death?" If so, why not act upon it now, and secure himself from self-upbraidings that stab deeper and with a deadlier venom than the poignard of the assassin?—Pat.

CUBA.—The Jamaica Morning Journal of the 5th of January contains the following account of the state of public feeling in Cuba:—

"From the character of our private intelligence from Havannah, we learn that a great and intense excitement—silent and quiet, but the more intense for its silence—pervades all the planters, merchants, and intelligent proprietors of that charming island; and that, apprehending a transfer may be made to England of the sovereignty of the island, or at least the possession of Havannah given up through the necessities or intrigues of the Spanish Government at Madrid—apprehending all these designs, and zealous of the recent conduct of the British Government and their own Government under that influence, they are beginning to entertain thoughts of entire revolution, and final separation from the Spanish connection at no very distant day. The conduct of the British authorities, the weakness of their own Government at Madrid, the intrigues of the British Abolitionists in Cuba, all con-tur in causing the deep and intense excitement to increase throughout the island; and particularly in the city of Havannah, which is the strongest fortress in this hemisphere, and which, in possession of the British, would cause by proximity to their Abolition doctrines, one of the most fearful issues that ever took place in the Southern States. This feeling of discontent in Cuba has been heightened by the movements of the abolitionists in England, and the low prices of Colonial produce of late years. The feeling is gradually increasing, and where it will end, no one can tell.—Pat.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

FORT WILLIAM,
FOREIGN DEPARTMENT, SECRET,
27TH MAY, 1843.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDIA.

Agra, the 16th May, 1843.

The Governor General has directed the publication of the following letter from His Excellency the Governor of Scinde, with its several enclosures

The Governor General has much satisfaction in making generally known the able dispositions made by Captain Thomas, of the 8th Bombay native infantry, for the defence of the entrenched camp during the battle near Hyderabad, on the 24th of March.

The Governor General has likewise much satisfaction in making known the names of the officers and men, who have been already reported as specially distinguished in the battle of Hyderabad. The reports from the remaining regiments will be published whenever they may be received.

By order of the Right Honourable the Governor General of India,

J. THOMASON, Secy. to the Govt. of India, with the Governor General.

From His Excellency the Governor of Scinde,
To the Right Honourable the Governor-General.

Camp, Hyderabad, 17th April, 1843.

MY LORD,—I have the honour to enclose to your Lordship, the reports made by officers commanding regiments, of remarkable actions performed by individuals under their command, in the battle fought on the 24th March.

Also the report of Captain Thomas, of the 8th N. I., of the preparations made by him for the defence of the entrenchments at the Residency, to attack which the enemy had detached five thousand men to Hooserie, a village hard by, but subsequently he recalled this force to his main body at Dubba. It is right that I should state how much importance attached to the defence of the entrenchments, which there was every reason to believe would be attacked, as also the town of Hyderabad. These two garrisons diminished my force by 1,079 men and two pieces of cannon, and I have to express my sense of the good arrangements and zeal of Major Reid and Captain Thomas, the officers whom (greatly against their own wishes) I ordered to remain in command of these two garrisons.

I have, &c.
(Signed) C. J. NAPIER, Governor.

The great pressure of business prevented my sooner having forwarded these reports.

From Captain A. THOMAS,
Commanding entrenched Camp,
To the Acting Assistant Adjutant General,
Scinde Field Force.

Camp, Hyderabad, 8th April, 1843.

SIR,—I have the honour to transmit for the information of Major General Sir Charles J. Napier, K. C. B., Governor of Scinde, that on the departure of the force on the morning of the 24th of March, my first care was to assign posts to the officers and men under my command, which was done in the following manner: To Lieutenant Steward, of the 16th grenadiers Bengal N. I., was confided the defence of the left flank of the breast-works; to Lieut. Bosanquet, of the same regiment, the right flank; and Lieut. Pruen, Bombay artillery, and myself took charge of the front and reserve. The two guns left with me were most judiciously placed en barbette, by Lieutenant Pruen, so that in case of attack they would have swept the whole of the works in front, and one entire flank. Two parties of sepoys, consisting of fifty men each, were formed as a reserve and posted fifty paces on each side of the abattis, leading into the Residency compound. The remaining sepoys were placed round the works, at intervals of ten paces distant, in single files, supported by matchlockmen and dismounted horsemen belonging to Meer Ali Morad, under the command of Sirdar Ali Hossein. Each flank abutting on the Indus, was further protected by the Meteor and Nimrod, armed steamers, which effectually guarded against either of them being turned.

A reserve of fifty horse was posted in rear of the Residency compound equally distant from both flanks, and so as to be able to co-operate where most required. A similar reserve, and for a similar purpose, was posted in the centre of the front of the breast-work. The Khyheery horse were divided into two parties and placed one hundred paces in rear of each flank near the river, so that had either flank been turned these men would have been at hand to drive the enemy back without requiring any man behind the breast-work to leave his post.

Forty men of the Scinde horse under a jemadar, defended on foot that part of the breast-work behind which they had encamped.

After posting the men, and seeing that each knew his position so as to fall in his proper place at a moment's warning, half the men were told off as a working party to render the unfinished entrenchments as secure as the limited time allowed us would admit of. By the evening I considered we were perfectly secure, having placed abattis composed of babool trees, wherever we were unable to finish the trench.

Half the men during the day were always at their posts. At sunset every man fell in at his allotted station, and his arms, ammunition, &c., were carefully inspected. During the night sentries were placed at intervals of twenty yards, the entire round of the works the remaining men sleeping in their accoutrements, with the arms loaded by them; the officers doing the same. Outlying picquets of horse were stationed two hundred and fifty yards outside the entrenchment on both flanks and front, who threw out videttes and patrolled at the distance of from one to two miles from the works, each patrol crossing the other every half hour, and a report hourly delivered during the night. These at sun-rise were withdrawn, and smaller parties of horse swept round the camp at four and five miles distance during the day.

These were the arrangements I deemed proper for the defence of the camp, the charge of which I had the honour to be entrusted with by the Major General and Governor in Scinde; and although no attack was made on the camp, still I hope I shall not be deemed presumptuous in declaring that from the zeal and alacrity displayed by both officers and men under my command, there was no fear that, although our numbers were small and the works extensive to defend, had we been attacked we would have endeavoured to emulate the gallant example set us by the troops under the Major General, more particularly after the re-inforcement was received under Brevet Captain Unwin, artillery, consisting of forty European artillery men, and two 68-pounder howitzers.

On the morning of the 24th March, we were re-inforced by the Persian Prince Aga Khan, with twenty-five horsemen. He informed me that he had been driven out of Jurrick by three thousand Beloochees, with the loss on his side of one hundred killed and wounded in action, out of one hundred and thirty.

Only on one occasion did I hear of any Beloochees being within four miles of me, and then Sirdar Ali Hussein with eighty horse, was despatched just before daybreak to reconnoitre, with orders to sweep the country for seven or eight miles round. He returned at 10 A. M., and reported that no enemy was to be seen or heard of. This proved to be the case, and with the exception of detached parties on the other side of the river progressing towards the hills, nothing more was heard of the enemy.

On the arrival of the Planet, steamer, from Sukkur, Lieutenant McLeod of the 20th regiment N. I., volunteered his services, as also did Lieutenant Pottinger of the 15th regiment N. I., of which I gladly availed myself.

Sirdar Ali Hussein co-operated most zealously with me, as also did all his people. The Khyree chiefs and their men behaved also very well.

In conclusion, I beg to express my thanks for the assistance I received from the officers during the time I was in command of the entrenched camp.

Camp, Allyar ka-Tanda, 28th March, 1843.

SIR,—In obedience to Division Orders I have the honour to report, for the information of Major General Sir C. J. Napier, K. C. B., Commanding in Scinde and Beloochistan, that I am unable to particularize any individual who prominently distinguished himself in action on the 24th instant. I trust, however, the Major General will not consider me presumptuous in bringing to his notice the steadiness of the regiment when under a very heavy fire close in front of the village on the enemy's right, and where we had the irreparable misfortune of losing a gallant and much esteemed officer, Captain Garrett. In the same place Lieutenant Snow had his horse and shoulder scales struck by matchlock bullets.

The enemy appearing to occupy the village in great force, I did not consider myself justified in leaving the left of our guns exposed, before the order reached me, "cavalry to the front," when I immediately advanced, and came round the village, passing in my way to the Fulailee, three deep nullahs. We first advanced a short distance to the left, but seeing no enemy, returned, and then went off to the right, and followed up the enemy for about six miles, cutting up all we met, and brought in two camels. The ground was much intersected by numerous deep canals, and I am happy to state all the men behaved in a most soldier-like manner; were perfectly obedient to every word of command I gave, and moved steadily in line throughout the whole charge.

ROLL of Warrant Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and Troopers, of the 3d Regiment Light Cavalry, who distinguished themselves in the action fought on the 24th instant.

Camp, Allyar-ka-Tanda, 30th March, 1843.

Riding Master Walter.—For gallant conduct in engaging and killing several of four men that attacked him, and capturing one of their horses, his own charger (private property,) being killed in the encounter. He was finally rescued by naick Bhowany Sing, who came to his assistance. Riding Master Walter was acting as Adjutant on that day.

Havildar General Sing, 3d Troop.—Conspicuous gallantry in singly engaging several men assembled, both on horse-back and on foot, and killing one or more of them.

Naick Bhowany Sing, 6th Troop.—Steady and gallant conduct in proceeding to the rescue of Riding Master Walter, who was surrounded by the enemy, and there doing good and essential service.

Trooper Hussein Bux, 6th Troop.—Gallant conduct in rushing into the midst of the enemy to the rescue of Subadar Sahabut Khan, who, in endeavouring to capture a Standard, had got surrounded by them. He killed several of the enemy on this occasion. He had before distinguished himself, and been wounded in action.

Lance naick Chunder Sing, 3d Troop.—Fought nobly; after killing two men was knocked off his horse, which was immediately afterwards shot. He then had to fight his way on foot, in doing which it is said, he killed several more.

SIR,—In compliance with Division Orders of the 26th instant, I have the honour to request you will bring to the notice of Major General Sir C. J. Napier, K. C. B., that the conduct of the Poona horse, under my command, on the 24th, in the action with the enemy was such, that it would be invidious in me to notice any of the numerous acts of gallantry performed by the Sowars on that occasion. But when all behaved well, I cannot neglect to notice in particular the conduct of duffadar Ahmed Khan, who, throughout the action was ever foremost, and led on the men in a manner which elicited my warmest approbation. This man has already the 3d class Order of Merit, from his having, at the fight at Nufoosk, in the Murree Hills, saved (under much peril) his commanding officer's life. He, on the 24th, in my presence cut down three of the enemy, and also saved my life by sabreing the Beloochee, who wounded me in the sword-hand. I consider his conduct as well deserving the favourable notice of the Major General.

SIR,—In reference to Division Orders, calling for the names of officers, non-commissioned and privates, who distinguished themselves in the battle of the 24th instant, I have made every enquiry, and after due consideration, I have great difficulty in being able to make selections of particularly distinguished conduct, on an occasion when great gallantry and forwardness was conspicuous in the regiment. I hope, I am not doing injustice by mentioning the following names: Lieutenant Coote was the first to surmount the enemy's works, and whilst waving a Standard he captured, and giving assistance to a soldier to reach the crest of the breast-work, was severely wounded.

Corporal Timothy Kelly shot a man bearing a silver knobbed Standard, and captured it.

SIR,—With reference to Division Orders of the 26th instant, I do myself the honour to report, for the information of Major General Sir C. J. Napier, K. C. B., commanding the troops in Scinde and Belochistan, that in the general engagement which took place on the 24th instant, Purgass Sing, jemadar of the light company, of the regiment under my command, whilst skirmishing, accompanied by five sepoys of his own company, killed seven of the enemy, one of them supposed to be a chief, whom the jemadar slew in single combat, and captured his arms. Private Appojee Surosee, of the light company, killed one of the enemy's Standard bearers, capturing his Standard, pursued and killed another of the enemy, in whose possession was a sword belonging to the 3d regiment light cavalry, which he recovered. Private Rugonat Sing, of the 3d company bayonetted two of the enemy in presence of Captain Tait, commanding the Poona horse; he also bayonetted two of the enemy, and wounded a third, in presence of some of the Poona horse, which latter circumstance, the men belonging to that corps who witnessed the deeds, especially requested Captain Tait to bring to my notice. Major Waddington also was present.

SIR,—In obedience to Division Orders of yesterday's date, I beg to hand up the names of the undermentioned European commissioned, and non-commissioned officers and men, as follows:—

Lieutenant W. E. Wilkinson, Adjutant, 21st N. I. — Came to the front to support me as I was leading the regiment over the centre ridge in the canal, which formed the enemy's position, and seeing a man, who has, I believe, since been ascertained to be Meer Goolam Ali Talpooree, coming at me, sword in hand, stepped in between and cut him down, in doing which he received a wound on the head, which cut through his pugree, and displaced the metal peak of a horse artillery helmet, and must have killed him, but for this defence, and he also got wounded in the sword-arm.

Naick Sew Umber Bhut, grenadier company. — Was wounded in four or five places, (I have no means of ascertaining more exactly, as the man was sent into Hyderabad so soon). Some of the wounds severe, but he would not leave the ranks, setting an example of fearlessness and devotion to his duty, which I hope, may be looked upon favourably. I have promised this man the first vacancy for the third stripe.

Private Oree Guzuria, 4th company. — Severely wounded in the thigh, but would not leave the ranks, and while I was requesting him to do so, seeing some heads over the bank, fired his piece, and continued loading and firing till the end of the engagement.

I beg to explain, that the nature of the duty entrusted to the 21st regiment, was such as in a great measure to preclude the possibility of any display of individual courage. The regiment was ordered to reserve its fire till within ten or fifteen paces of the enemy, and not a shot was fired till I gave the word, which I did not do till I got to within from ten to fifteen paces from the canal consequently the whole regiment was able to jump into it at almost the same moment, and advanced in the same order, as much as the nature of the position admitted, the most active getting up the centre ridge first. Officers not being encumbered with a musket and pouch, of course had the advantage; but I can safely say, that none were backward, and I consider it would be invidious to mention the name of any, whom chance, or a superior degree of bodily activity, had enabled to gain a position to which all appeared to aspire equally.

To prove that I was as well supported by my men as I could desire, I hope it may not be considered foreign to the subject to mention, that though attacked by several men, one after the other, I had not occasion once to act in my own defence.

I have, &c.
Comdg. 21st Regt. N. I.

From Major A. WOODBURN,
Commanding 2d Brigade,
To the Acting Assistant Adjutant General,
Scinde Field Force.

Camp, near Allyar-ka-Tanda, 28th March, 1843.

SIR,—In reference to Division Orders of the 26th instant, calling on commanding officers to forward a statement of acts of gallantry performed by any commissioned, non-commissioned officers, or men, in the action of the 24th instant, I do myself the honour to transmit the only letter on this subject, which I have received in the 2d brigade.

2. As I was myself partly a witness to an act of courage and good example in the 25th regiment, I beg to be allowed to submit it to the Major General commanding. When this regiment reached the village, the firing of the enemy, though greatly lessened, was still kept up in a very galling way, from many of the houses. This was particularly the case from a mosque with had been loopholed, and the shots from it knocked over several sepoys. The building was entered by some of the men who were almost immediately driven out by the enemy. On seeing this, Ensign Nixon and Lieutenant Thomson, 25th regiment, instantly rushed into it, sword in hand, and attacked the enemy, eight in number. The former officer cut down three with his own hand, but while so engaged, his life was saved by the latter (Lieutenant Thomson) warding off cuts made at him. The sepoys having, in the mean time got in, disposed of the remaining five. In this affair subadar Russall Singh, a gallant old native officer, took a prominent part, and had his sword broken in giving point to one of the enemy, and color havildar Hoolass Singh, grenadier company, got a wound in the leg by a sword cut. In addition to these Lieutenant Thomson has mentioned to me, that havildar Ballik Ram Tewarree, 5th; naick Ram Sah Panday, 4th; private Pursaud Maray, 5th; and private Soomur Singh, 5th companies, particularly distinguished themselves by their courageous conduct on the occasion referred to, and all four were wounded in it.

3. In conclusion I can only state that, so far as came under my observation, every officer and man in the 2d brigade did his duty well and truly.

(Signed) ALEX. WOODBURN, Major,
Commanding 2d Brigade.

The undermentioned individuals, who were appointed hospital apprentices in General Orders of the 24th of January last, having failed to report themselves to the superintending Surgeons within whose circles they are residing, are struck off the list of subordinate medical servants:

Benjamin Hunt, James McMurray, Edmund Gorman, William Henry Hempton, Thomas Pereira, Thomas Blair Payne, and Alexander Ure.

The following persons are appointed hospital apprentices, to complete the subordinate medical establishment, and are directed to report themselves, within two months from the date, to the nearest superintending Surgeons.

J. D. Allison, William Cox, David Palmer, Christopher Joshua Leopold, Samuel Patrick Bryan, Thomas Gill, and Joseph A. Pinherio.

After these apprentices shall have served six months in any European hospital, special reports of their talents and acquirements are to be made to head quarters, by the superintending Surgeon of the division in which they may be employed; and should it appear that any of them are not likely to become efficient subordinate medical attendants, such individuals as may be so considered, will either be discharged from the service, or otherwise disposed of, as may hereafter be determined on. This is to be distinctly explained to the apprentices on their joining an hospital.

---

Head Quarters, Simlah, 15th May, 1843.

GENERAL ORDERS—QUEEN'S TROOPS.

At a General Court Martial held at Subathoo, on the 12th day of May 1843, private George Gue, No. 995, of No. 8 company, Her Majesty's 13th or Prince Albert's regiment of light infantry was arraigned on the following charges:

Charges.—1st. With mutinous conduct, for having at Camp Kussowlie, on the morning of the 11th April, 1843, struck Corporal James Campbell, of the same company and regiment, a violent blow on the breast, with his clenched fist, when in the execution of his duty.

2d. With having, on the aforesaid date, made use of threatening language towards Sergeant Edward Cowen, of the same company and regiment, in the presence of the officer commanding his company, after the investigation of the crime specified in the first charge.

Finding.—The Court from the evidence before it, is of opinion, that the prisoner private George Gue, No. 995, of No. 8 infantry, is guilty of the first charge.

That he is guilty of the second charge.

Sentence.—The Court having found the prisoner guilty, do sentence him, Private George Gue, No. 995, of No. 8 company, Her Majesty's 13th or Prince Albert's regiment of light infantry, to suffer imprisonment for a period of twelve (12) lunar months, in such place as the officer commanding Her Majesty's 13th or Prince Albert's regiment of light infantry, may please to appoint.

(Signed) CHARLES BARNWELL, Major,
H. M.'s 9th Foot and President.

Subathoo, 12th May, 1843.

Approved and confirmed.
(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General,

A VERY BEAUTIFUL ASTRONOMICAL TIME PIECE,

BY SHEARER, OF LONDON.

Who made the first of the kind for H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex.

THE above TIME PIECE is of the most elegant construction, and is so fitted with a glass case to a handsome stand, that every part of the mechanism is distinctly seen. There are two sets of dials, the one shewing mean solar time, and the other sidereal time. Connected with the Clock work are two Globes of six inches diameter; of which the Terres trial performs a revolution in a mean solar day, so as to exhibit the various places on the Earth's surface, as they are presented to the Sun, the position of which is represented by the meridian circle: whilst the Celestial performs a revolution in a sidereal day, so as to exhibit the stars in the position in which they are in the heavens, at any hour of the day or night. There is lastly a circle placed horizontally, which revolves once a year, so as to shew the day of the month correctly.

The mechanism of the Time Piece, both in design and execution, is of the first order: and to prevent its being injured by the removal of the glass shade, there is an apparatus for winding up the works from the outside, which is entirely detached from the movement except when in the act of winding.

The Time Piece may be seen at Mr. E. Gray's, Hare Street, Calcutta.

EUROPEAN AND ORIENTAL AGENCY.

MR. PARKE PITTAR

HAVING arranged the formation of an Agency, the particular object of which will be the transaction of affairs, connected with this country and Europe, begs to offer his services to the community of India, in any way they can be rendered available.

A peculiar and important feature in the Agency now established, will consist in the annual return of Mr. P. Pittar to India. Taking advantage of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Steam Vessels, he purposes re-visiting Calcutta about the latter end of every October, and returning to Europe about the middle of the following February, thus affording to persons entrusting the management of their affairs to his care, the opportunity of a personal conference and explanation of their views and intentions,—an advantage in the transaction of affairs of a complicated, or family nature, the greatness of which need not be commented upon.

A long residence in India, combined with an intimate knowledge of almost every description of manufactured article, and its various manufacturers, rendering him peculiarly fitted for the office of Agent to persons procuring their supplies or other articles, such as Table Equipages, Philosophical and Optical Instruments, Books, Maps, Sporting Apparatus, Musical Instruments, Military Equipments, Wines, &c. &c. direct from Europe, he offers them his services with every confidence that his selections will give the most perfect satisfaction, whether as regarding quality, cheapness, or adaptation to the climate; but in the execution of these commissions, a previous remittance for their full amount, or reference for payment, will invariably be required.

Every article purchased through this Agency will be most minutely examined previous to its being packed and the same care under every circumstances, taken as if persons were themselves individually present and superintending. Packages of a large size will, as usual, be shipped by fast-vessels to their destined port; but those of smaller dimensions, will, (unless otherwise instructed,) be sent through the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Office, Overland; thus enabling persons in most instances to receive their orders fully executed within four months from the date of the transmission of their instructions.

In transactions of a private and confidential nature a fair remuneration, according to circumstances, will be expected: in those of the ordinary nature of Agency Business, the Commission will be regulated by the customary rates; and for the selection, purchase and shipment of goods, a Commission of 5 per cent. on the gross amount will be charged.

Letters to the address of MR. PARKE PITTAR, EUROPEAN AND ORIENTAL AGENCY OFFICE, LONDON, will meet with the most prompt attention.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

The Editor of the Friend of India begs to acknowledge the following donation:

From H. Brownlow, Esq. Co.'s Rs. 32, to the Benevolent Institution, Calcutta.

China.—Intelligence has been received from China to the 8th of May. The good understanding which appeared to subsist between the Chinese Government and the British Plenipotentiary has not been interrupted by the death of the old Commissioner, Elepoo. The Emperor had appointed Ke Ying his successor, and he was expected to reach Canton before the end of May, when the negotiations relative to the Tariff were to be resumed. There appears to be every prospect of an early and satisfactory adjustment of it.

The smuggling which has for some time been carried on in the river of Canton by some of the mercantile firms, in conjunction with the Chinese officers, had at length reached a point at which it appeared to call for the active interference of the Plenipotentiary. This smuggling the reader must not confound with the opium smuggling; it refers only to the legitimate trade of the port. The attempts which had been successfully made to evade the port dues, chiefly by smuggling goods during the night to and from vessels which had paid the usual charges, were not only disgraceful to our national character, but threatened to obstruct the settlement of the Tariff. Sir Henry Pottinger, considered it impossible any longer to remain silent, and under the apprehension that the Chinese authorities might be led to suppose that he either connived at, or approved of these practises, wrote to the Governor General of Canton to assure him officially that such practises were totally at variance with the intentions and wishes of his Government, and that he should be happy to unite with his Excellency in putting a stop to the evil. His Excellency in reply to this communication stated, that there were no doubt good and upright men among the English merchants, but yet it was to be feared that "out of every ten there might be one or two given to deceit. The Honourable Plenipotentiary for his part gives no encouragement whatever to smuggling ...... Now that we are consulting together about a Tariff of Duties, I still more devoutly hope, that the Plenipotentiary will come forward with a plan of Rules and Regulations to be inscribed in our Code as a lasting guide, how we may set together in searching and preventing abuses." The friendly feelings with which the Chinese now regard our Government and people, are not more apparent from this proposal to unite in the formation of a commercial Code, than from the very favourable estimate which the Governor General has so generously formed of the English merchants in China, of whom he considers that only one in ten, or at farthest one in five may be given to smuggling. It is to be feared that the proportion of those who have engaged in these dishonourable practices, is far greater than his Excellency has any idea of. Sir Henry Pottinger designates it a shameless and disreputable system of wholesale smuggling, which he regards with deep regret and unmitigated disapprobation. These are strong expressions, but not stronger than the enormity of the evil justifies. It seems indeed incredible that gentlemen who pride themselves on sustaining the high and honourable character of British merchants, should deliberately engage in a system of disgraceful smuggling at Canton, from which they would shrink with abhorrence in London or Calcutta; and we can account for it only on the idea that the illegal traffic in opium, which has latterly been carried on with the ferocity of buccaneers, has contributed in a great measure to obscure in their minds the distinction between right and wrong. The Plenipotentiary has announced to them his determination, on the arrival of the Imperial Commissioner, to devise means for bringing all parties, whether Chinese or Foreigners, to account for their share in the transactions; and to aid and advise the Chinese officers, as far as may be legal, in whatever measures they may adopt to eradicate these evils.

The Senior Officer at Chusan has issued a notice, declaring that no vessels should proceed from Chusan to Ningpo, Woosung, or Shanghae, till the settlement of the Tariff, and one of the papers received by this opportunity states that three vessels which had disregarded this order, had been seized. The Canton Press doubts whether the officer has any right to issue any such orders, or to act upon them. But if this be the case, the authority of Her Majesty's representative in China, who is invested with all the powers necessary for the Superintendent of Trade, must be merely nominal.

The papers also state, that one of the richest, the most influential, and the most honourable firms in China had fitted out for the eastern ports, two armed schooners, bearing the American flag, and laden them with opium. It is added, that other vessels of a similar character, and under the same protection, might shortly be expected in China. Thus the embarrassment which the question of the right of search has occasioned on the coast of Africa is about to be reproduced on the Coast of China. According to the doctrine of the President of the United States, no English ship of war has a right to board a vessel which hoists the American flag, to ascertain whether she be boná fide American property or not. The American Government has declared the slave trade, piracy; and it is a crime according to the republican Code; but the attempt to sell opium at the various ports of the Chinese empire is in the eye of the American law, no crime; and American vessels of war have no authority to prevent it. The vessels laden with the drug and protected by the star spangled banner may therefore bid defiance equally to the naval force of England and America; and thus every effort to prevent the traffic, is baffled by new contrivances.

The Donation to Juggunnath's Temple.—The arrangement made by Lord Auckland for the support of the temple of Juggunnath upon the abolition of the Pilgrim Tax, has been the subject of a very acrimonious debate in the Court of Proprietors, and a strenuous effort has been made to nullify it by those who are opposed to the connection of Government with the shrines of idolatry. We find that a pamphlet has been also published in this matter by Mr. Strahan, formerly of Madras, but we have not been able to obtain a copy of it, and are therefore ignorant of the ground of his argument. It is not a little singular that a question on which the British Government has repeatedly legislated, should be involved in so much obscurity, and that the pledge said to have been given by the British Government, and which alone can have justified Lord Auckland's having perpetuated the donation, in the teeth of the Court's prohibition, should never yet have been discovered. As the subject is likely to be brought again under the consideration of the Home authorities, we propose to put together all the information we have been able to glean.

The Pilgrim tax originated with the old Hindoo dynasty of Orissa. Its sovereigns, we are told, devoted fifty lakhs of Rupees to the construction and embellishment of the temple, and we may naturally conclude, that they supported its establishment in corresponding splendor. The Mahomedan Government at first treated the image and its priests with the fury of iconoclasts; but they also found it eventually advisable to tax the pilgrims for the benefit of their treasury, and it is to be supposed that they gave enough of the crumbs of the tax to keep up the integrity of the establishment. The Mahomedans were succeeded by the Mahrattas, and though the tax was not remitted by that Hindoo dynasty, yet a sum which has been assumed at 80,000 Rupees a year, was appropriated from the state treasury to the support of the idol. On the 18th of September 1803, the British authorities took possession of the temple. For two years they refrained from imposing any tax on the pilgrims, but being anxious to avoid all violent changes, they continued to supply the wants of the temple as they arose. The priests at this time enjoyed the revenue of the Sataish Hazar estates; the proceeds of a poll tax, which constituted one of the Sayer duties; and the benefit arising from the sale of the Muhapruad, or food which had been offered to the idol. Whatever the priests demanded above these sums. was paid out of the land revenues. They doubtless enjoyed a golden harvest during these two years of our apprenticeship to the Government; for they appear to have received all they asked, and their demands were not therefore likely to be remarkable for their modesty. To check the increasing cupidity of the hierarchy at Pooree, it was judged necessary to come to some understanding with them in order to limit the expenditure of the Idol, The Commissioners for the affairs of Cuttack, after having instituted a minute enquiry into the various items of expense at the temple, at length fixed the sum at 56,000 Rupees a year, besides broad cloth for the cars, which the Company, as they were then traders, supplied from their own warehouse.

There does not appear therefore to have been any other foundation for the annual donation, but the anxiety of the Commissioners to limit the demand on our treasury, which demand arose from no engagements with those who surrendered the country, or with the priests of the temple, but from that easiness of disposition which so often characterized our Government in the earlier stages of its existence in this country, and to which so much of its subsequent embarrassment is to be attributed.

On the 5th of September, 1805, the fiscal arrangements of the province were promulgated in Regulation XII. of that year, and it was provided that "nothing contained in this Regulation should be construed to authorize the resumption of the established donation for the support of the temple of Juggunnath, the charitable donation to the officers of certain Hindoo temples, called Unoochutree, and the allowance [illegible] for the support of the Hindoo temple [illegible] called Seetaram Takoor's baree." [illegible] of the two latter allowances we have [illegible] of knowing; but the established donation to Juggunnath, could not then have [illegible] six months old. On the 3d of April, 1806, the Regulation which imposed a tax on pilgrims, was passed by Sir George Hilaro Barlow, who had risen from the ranks of the service to the post of Governor General. In that Regulation we find it stated in Sect. 6, that the fees of the officers of the temple should be paid out of the funds which have been or may be assigned for the support of the temple. These are the only allusions to be found in the Regulations to the donation made by the British Government for its establishment.

When the pilgrim tax, from the proceeds of which this donation had been paid, was abolished, a new arrangement became necessary. The broad cloth for the three cars had been commuted into an annual payment of 1000 Rs., making the whole disbursement in the year preceding the abolition, 57,000 Rupees. The Sataish hazaree estates, which under the management of the priests had yielded to the temple establishment only 12,000 Rs., had been rendered more productive under the honest management of our own officers. The poll tax had been abolished with the Sayer. The sacred food, the Muhaprusad, afforded a small income; but when these items were put together, they were found to fall short of the annual expenditure of 57,000 Rs. by 35,000 Rs. and Lord Auckland determined that this sum should form an annual charge on the territorial revenues.

We have therefore to enquire, whether Lord Auckland was bound by any pre-existing engagement to make a perpetual donation of 35,000 Rs. from the British treasury for the support of the temple. And the solution of this question will depend not so much on the terms of the original agreement between the Commissioners in 1805, and the Ministers of the shrine, as upon the construction which may be put on Regulation XII. of 1805, in which the existence of the arrangement is legislatively announced. "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the resumption of the established donation for the support of the temple." Do these expressions simply mean that at the time of the revenue settlement of the province promulgated in that Regulation, it was not the intention of Government to set aside the arrangement for the support of the temple which had recently been concluded, but that it was optional with Government at any future time to modify it by any subsequent enactment, or is it to be construed as giving a fixed and unalterable character to the donation, and bringing it within the category of vested rights? Did Government by the assurance given in that Regulation, that it was not intended to disturb the arrangement, tie up its hands from interfering with it in all time to come? It may be argued on the one hand, that if Government did not intend to give a legal sanction to the established donation, there could have been no object in alluding to it, and that the adoption of the word "established," imparts a kind of perpetual obligation to the arrangement. On the other hand, it may be argued, that as the established donation is mentioned in conjunction with other charitable donations, which can scarcely have been considered as possessing a permanent character, the clause must be considered as simply announcing the views of Government at the time, and not as imposing an obligation on every future administration. There is abundant scope for the exercise of reasoning and casuistry on both sides of the question, and we leave it to the ingenuity of others to divine the scope of the legislature. Considerable light might be thrown on the subject by ascertaining whether the charitable donation to certain Hindoo temples called Unoochuttree, and the allowance for Seetaram Thakoor's baree, have been discontinued. We know not whether this has been the case, or not; but if it turns out that the other two donations have been modified, notwithstanding the declaration of that law, it must follow that the donation to Juggunnath is not unalterable.

It must be manifest that a shrine so celebrated as that of Juggunnath, which is the resort of wealthy pilgrims from all parts of India, can stand in no need of any support from the state. Superstition supplies ample funds for its own maintenance, and the assistance of Government can be claimed only on the ground that some of the legitimate revenues of a shrine have been resumed by public authority. It must be borne in mind that this "established donation" was legally recognized for the first time when Government had announced its intention to appropriate to its own use the revenues of the shrine. That Regulation (XII. of 1805) declared that a tax was about to be established on pilgrims. Within seven months, the arrangements of this tax were promulgated by authority. Government set up an establishment of its own for collecting the pilgrim tax, and carried the proceeds to its own treasury, and prohibited the ministers of the temple from exacting any sums of money from pilgrims. The donation to the temple, which was altogether gratuitous on the part of our Government during 1804 and 1805, become obligatory after that period. When all the funds from which the idol had been supported were thus taken possession of by Government, it was bound in reason and in justice to keep up the establishment by appropriating to its use a certain portion of the revenue which it derived from the temple.

In 1840 Government abolished the pilgrim tax; but continued to prohibit the officers of the temple from demanding of the pilgrims those sums which the Regulation of 1805 designated their usual fees. These fees are the natural and indefeasible right of the Rajah of Khoorda as the lord of the temple. Every proprietor of every temple in India has a right to fix his own price on the enjoyment of those religious benefits which are supposed to belong to it. Every other temple in India enjoys the undisturbed exercise of this prerogative. It was by law withheld from the proprietors of the temple of Juggunnath in 1840, and Government is therefore bound, in equity, to give the shrine an equivalent for it. We conceive that as long as the ministers of the temple are debarred from demanding of the pilgrims those fees, for its religious privileges which are their natural due, so long must the donation be continued. Whenever Government shall see fit to abolish Sect. 3 of Reg. 10, of 1840, which ordains that the "said Rajah of Khoorda shall not receive or allow to be received by any person connected with the Temple any payment other than such voluntary donations as may be freely offered from any person resorting to the said temple for the performance of religious ceremonies," and shall allow the Rajah to enter on the enjoyment of his natural rights, the donation from the state should cease.

There can be no doubt that the Rajah and the ministers of the temple, far from considering the withdrawal of the donation and the concurrent restoration of their right to demand the usual fees, as any violation of our pledge, would be "immersed in an ocean of joy," to use an oriental expression. And it is only with the proprietors of the temple that the pledge, on which the donation is supposed to rest, can have any thing to do. The pilgrims from various parts of India, who may be affected by this arrangement, will doubtless feel less satisfaction than the Ministers of the temple, at being obliged to pay for the performance of religious ceremonies at Jugunnath, as they do at every other shrine. But it is no part of our vocation in India to take upon ourselves the payment of an equivalent for such religious fees, in order that the resort to an idolatrous temple may be rendered easy and inviting. The question is therefore brought within a very narrow compass; and the British Government, whatever construction may be placed upon the arrangements to which it became a party nearly forty years ago, may satisfy every obligation, and withdraw honourably from the connection by restoring to the proprietor of the temple the Sataish hazaree estates, the proceeds of the sale of the sacred food, and the privilege of collecting the usual dues from the pilgrims.

That the settlement made by Lord Auckland will not be allowed to stand, is beyond all doubt. The same party which constrained the Court of Directors, in spite of their repugnance, to relinquish their connection with idolatrous shrines, is now engaged to consummate the measure by abolishing this donation. That party is strong in numbers, but still stronger by its zeal and its indomitable perseverance. We have pointed out the mode in which we think our connection may be dissolved without any sacrifice of national honour, and with the highest satisfaction of the Priests. We have therefore only one further remark to offer. The attack which has been made on Lord Auckland for this settlement, on the ground that it arose from his personal indifference to Christian truth and his partiality for idols, is any thing but just. His Lordship was obliged to consult and in some measure to act on the opinion of the local authorities of the district. They are believed to have strenuously resisted the abolition of the tax; and to have insisted on the grant of this monthly donation, when they found that the tax could not be saved. Neither do we attribute their tenacity to any fondness for idolatry, but to that feeling of complacency for the religion of the country which is too apt to creep over the mind; and their anxiety to avoid any measure which might be disagreeable to the people placed under their guardianship. With such a predisposition, it was easy for them to persuade their own minds that there existed a pledge to support the establishment to the extent of 57,000 Rupees a year, which by the lapse of forty years had acquired the strength of prescription. Whatever may have been their motives, it is certain that Lord Auckland acted upon their representations; and we trust that when the subject is again before the Proprietors, they will, in justice to our late ruler, call for the correspondence of the local authorities with Government on this subject.

THE SUDDER COURT AGAIN.—The Hurkaru reports the decision of a case in the Principal Sudder Ameen's Court, of the 24-Pergunnahs, on the 5th of the present, which is of very considerable importance, because it affects the value of all the existing Precedents and Constructions of the Sudder Court.

It appears that Messrs. Boyd and Co. instituted a suit against Mr. Henry Piddington for his share of the rum and sugar manufactory of Goureepore, and obtained a decree in their favour. The Defendant appealed to the Sudder Court, and the case came on for hearing before Mr. Reid, one of the Judges, who remanded it to the Principal Sudder Ameen, directing him simply to enquire whether the defendant at the time when the suit was instituted, or at any subsequent period, resided in Calcutta; and if so, to non-suit the case under Reg. III. 1793, Sect. 17.

The Section runs thus:—"The Dewanny Adawlut of the Zillah of the twenty-four Purgunnahs, is not to receive or entertain any suit, under any pretence whatever, relating to any land, house, tenement, or hereditament, nor any dispute regarding the boundaries of lands, houses, tenements, or hereditaments, situated within the town of Calcutta, (which, for the purpose of this rule, is declared to be bounded by a line drawn by the bridge and nullah of the baug-bazar, or cow-cross, the Mahrattah entrenchment, and the road adjoining to it continued to the westward of the Colligaut road, the Govindpore nullah, and the river,) nor any suit whatever against a person who may be an inhabitant of Calcutta at the time the suit may be instituted, or may become a resident within the limits of the town after the suit may be commenced."

Mr. Smith, the attorney for the Assignees of Boyd and Co. stated that this Section had been ruled to refer only to personal actions of debt. He cited the Construction, No. 931, which, in language not to be misunderstood, announces the concurrence of the Sudder Courts of Allahabad and Calcutta in the opinion, that suits of this nature, that is, suits for land or other real property, situated within the limits of the 24-Pergunnahs, and brought against residents of the Town of Calcutta, were cognizable in that Court. This doctrine was supported by a quotation from the Analysis of the Laws by Mr. Harington, one of the highest legal authorities in the country. The attorney also appealed to the Court on the ground of reason and common sense; pointing out that under this new doctrine any person residing in the country against whom an action might be brought, had only to take refuge in Calcutta as soon as he had been served with a summons, to secure the plaintiff's being non-suited, and saddled with his own and the defendant's costs.

The Principal Sudder Ameen replied, that according to Con. No. 1073, whenever the Court above remanded a case, and restricted the enquiry to a single point, the inferior Court was not at liberty to travel beyond the tenor of that order; that however reasonable or legal might be Mr. Smith's objections, he could not attend to them, since he was bound by the express directions of Mr. Reid's order, to limit himself to this single enquiry, whether the defendant did at any time subsequent to the institution of the suit reside in Calcutta. Mr. Smith was obliged to acknowledge that Mr. Piddington, who was residing in the 24-Pergunnahs, when the action was brought against him, did subsequently go and reside in Calcutta. The Principal Sudder Ameen, therefore, in obedience to the injunctions of the Sudder Court, nonsuited the plaintiffs.

Such is the report of the case in the Hurkaru, but we cannot bring ourselves to credit it. There must be some error somewhere; either some point material to a right understanding of the case has been omitted, or Mr. Reid's order has been misunderstood. It is much easier to believe that the report is incorrect than that a single Judge, with whatever power he may be clothed, would thus deliberately set aside a rule in which both Courts had concurred, and one which could not be superseded without opening a door for the most glaring injustice. It is incredible that any Judge of the Court should have ruled that a defendant in an action for real property, in the 24-Pergunnahs, may baffle his creditors by simply crossing a certain conventional boundary, and taking up his abode in Calcutta. But there is more at stake than this single principle of law, important as it may be. This decision weakens the authority of the whole body of Constructions upon which hundreds and thousands of decisions are based. If that be law, my Lord, said Dunning to Lord Mansfield, I'll go home and burn my law books. You had better go home and read them, was the tart reply. But if, as in the present case, a solemn decision of the two Supreme Native Courts, can be upset at any moment without ceremony, it will be of little use to read the one thousand three hundred and seventy-five Constructions of the Courts. They are waste paper, fit only for a bonfire. Till we have better information, we must therefore conclude that the report of the Hurkaru, which is evidently furnished by the party cast, has some material omissions.

THE PAY OF DAROGAS.—It is generally reported, that a plan for increasing the pay of the Darogas has received the sanction of Government, and will be carried into effect without delay. It is said to provide for four grades of Officers in that department, the lowest of which will receive 25 Rupees a month, the second 50, the third 75, and the fourth 100 Rupees. It will also make the Darogas irremoveable except by the decision of the local Government.

Such a measure has been long called for. The people have learned from bitter experience that their peace and comfort are more dependent on the character and conduct of the Darogas, than of any other officers. Against no body of men are the complaints so loud and deep; and these indignant complaints are not founded upon imaginary grievances. It is because the people have been so incessantly subject to the oppression and rapacity of these Police officers, that the very name of the Daroga has become an object of terror, and his approach to a village a signal for every man to provide for his own safety. The Daroga has large power and little pay; and he is in a measure constrained by the necessity of his circumstances to turn his power into money, and make up, by unjust exactions, the allowance which Government denies him. The first step in reform is of course to remove the excuse for extortion. A Daroga says he cannot be honest and live. If he keeps a conveyance he has nothing left for food and raiment; and without a conveyance it is physically impossible for him to visit the villages where his presence is required by the orders of his superior. It has long therefore been evident that no small portion of the misery which the people have so bitterly and so generally complained of, is to be attributed to Government itself; which seems to have forgotten that to entrust underpaid officers with great authority is to make itself a party to the abuse of it. The increase of salary may not change the nature of the man; and he who has been accustomed to fleece the people while it appeared to him necessary for his subsistence, may continue the practise when it is necessary only for objects of personal indulgence. But it is indispensable to the character and dignity of Government that the excuse for this alleged necessity should be removed; and the present measure, adopted after twenty year's discussion and agitation, shews that Government has at length opened its ears to the voice of reason and common sense.

This new arrangement deserves much commendation, though it may leave room for farther improvement. The salaries allotted to the two higher grades, are sufficient to secure them a decent, and with their simple habits, in some measure a gentlemanly maintenance. But neither 25, nor even 50 Rupees a month will support a Darogah, in a manner corresponding with the position he occupies in society. Increase of pay is to be granted for length of service, but it is not to be proportioned to the extent of responsibility. In some cases, the circle placed under a Daroga of 25 Rupees, will be larger than that allotted to one who may receive 100 Rs. The same temptation to extortion, and the same excuse for it, which forms the opprobrium of our present system, will therefore be perpetuated in the case of more than half the Darogas of the country. Their noviciate will be passed amidst scenes of rapacity, and it is to be feared that the habits they contract while serving in the lower grades, will adhere to them after their elevation, and keep the general tone of official morality throughout the service, low. If it had been possible therefore, it would have been wiser to have raised the salaries of the lowest grade of officers to 60 or 70 Rs. a month;—but we must not expect too much at once. We are too grateful to Government for having at length adopted the sound principle that salaries should be proportioned to duties, to quarrel with the limited application of it in the first instance. Time and experience will suggest farther improvement, and the conviction which has led Government to take the first step will lead it gradually to the adoption of others.

The establishment of a graduated scale of allowances, as a reward for merit, will be found to work happily. Hitherto Government has been labouring to produce good, honest and efficient officers of Police, by working only on their fears; it has now resolved to try the stimulant of hope; and there can be no question that the combined operation of both motives will be far more effectual than the solitary motive of fear. It is to be hoped also that the increase of pay will raise the office itself in public estimation among the natives. At present the post of a Daroga, who has more work than pay, and more frowns than smiles, with no hope of promotion, is held in contempt by all the respectable classes of society, [illegible] will condescend to accept it except from dire necessity. Let us hope that the new system will bring men of education, family and character into the service, and thus enable Government to make the Darogaship a step to the Deputy Magistracy. Certainly no man will be better fitted by local knowledge and experience for those higher offices than those who have served as Darogas for eight or ten years.

THE AUXILIARY BIBLE SOCIETY'S NEW SPELLING LAW.—We publish in a letter from A Member of the Calcutta Bible Society, a comment on the Protest of the Twenty-seven Missionaries against the new law of the Bible Society and on our remarks thereupon. We think we have met this champion of the Society in the lists before, and are therefore little surprized at the acetous acid with which his observations are [illegible] up. He is afraid that our minds are [illegible]ing under the influence of party feelings, [illegible], and irritation;" he hints that "he [illegible] well where our weak part lies"—which is [illegible]lly supposed to be half the battle—He [illegible] hat "there is one questio vexata, which he is sure will distort our judgement;" and that we evidently write under "the irritating influence which a recollection of the controversy between the Bible Society and the Baptist body could not fail to produce,"—but he does not tell us with which body rests the blame of a controversy which necessarily produced such irritating effects. We will endeavour to set him right about this said controversy.

It is well known that the Serampore Missionaries, with whom we had the privilege of being associated as Colleagues while the Serampore Mission lasted, commenced the translation and printing of the Scriptures in the Oriental language before the Bible Society had an existence. Dr. Carey's translation of the New Testament into Bengalee was presented to George the Third in the year 1808. The Bible Society rose in 1804, and soon after expressed a wish to co-operate with and assist our deceased Colleagues in their translation labours. A Corresponding Committee was accordingly formed, which consisted of three Churchmen and three Dissenters—Puseyism was not then born. In 1811, Henry Martyn preached his well known sermon in the Old Church, which led to the formation of the Auxiliary Bible Society, into which the Corresponding Committee was merged. From the earliest period of this undertaking, the only condition required by the Parent Society at home, or the Auxiliary Society in Calcutta, before assistance was granted to a version, was that it should be faithful to the original and correct and idiomatic in its style. No question was asked about the mode in which any particular term was translated. Hence the word baptizo, was translated by Martyn, by Ellerton, by Thomason, and by the Serampore Missionaries in that mode which appeared to each of them best calculated to express the sense of the original. The latter of course translated it by a word which signified, immersion.

Sometime about 1832, some of the Missionaries in Calcutta remonstrated with the Bible Society against the encouragement of versions in which the word was translated in a manner which did not accord with their own views of the ordinance, and they requested the Society both here and at home to direct that every version published by its assistance from that time forward, should leave the word untranslated. The Parent Society was compelled by the pressure from India to give in to these views, and they addressed Dr. Carey and his Colleagues on the subject, requesting that the word baptize should be given as in the English version. They declined to comply with this new requisition. They represented that the Society had hitherto acted upon a Catholic spirit, and allowed each translator to follow his own conscientious convictions in this matter; that, if the Calcutta Missionaries objected to assist in the circulation of copies of the Scriptures in which the term was rendered by a word which signified immerse, the Society ought to assist them to print versions which they could conscientiously distribute. They reminded the Society that half the versions which they printed for distribution on the Continent of Europe, had the term translated—and by a word which corresponded closely with that used at Serampore. They considered it unjust that there should be one rule for the west, and another for the east; and that the Society should insist on conditions in Asia, which they had not the courage to propound to the Bible Societies in Europe.

The Parent Society however resolved to adhere to its new law, and wrote to inform Dr. Carey that he could expect no farther assistance from them. Dr. Carey had just been consigned to the tomb when the letter, which would have cut him off from all farther connection with the Society, with which he had been connected for thirty years, reached Serampore. Dr. Marshman was at the time one of the Secretaries to the Calcutta Bible Society; and though he had been subject to such indignity, resolved not to withdraw from it. He considered it an instrument of great good in this heathen land; and he determined, at every sacrifice of personal feelings, to continue to give its operations all the assistance in his power. In these views he had the concurrence of his colleagues. Within three years after these events, he also was called to his reward, and the Serampore Mission ceased to exist as a public and organized body. Our correspondent will be able to judge from this simple narrative whether the controversy is likely to have left any such feeling of rancour in our minds as to influence every discussion in which the Bible Society may be concerned. We appeal to him as a Christian minister whether it is generous to taunt those who under such provocations, have invariably abstained, even from complaint, with writing under the influence of "party feeling, prejudice and irritation," when they have occasion to discuss a question in which the same general principle of liberty is involved. We have since learned that the Bible Society in London have manifested the same inflexibility towards the Baptist Missionary Society, who have consequently been constrained to establish a Translation Society in their own denomination. With the controversy as carried on by them, we have no personal connection; though we still continue to think that in adopting one rule for the West and another for the East, the Society has shewn little sense of justice; and that in making a demand on those who were supposed to be too weak to resist, which they did not venture to make of those in Europe who it was well known would have scouted the proposal to alter their versions, they have exhibited little dignity of character. The only feeling which the controversy excites in our minds is one of regret for the inconsistency of the Bible Society. From that body we have nothing to ask; nothing to hope; and nothing to fear. If we could view the controversy in connection with the interests of the Baptist Mission in the East only, which at this Presidency embraces 61 Missionaries, while all other Protestant Mission put together number but 56, we should at once pronounce the schism to be auspicious rather than the reverse; for it has led to the publication of twice the number of copies of the Scriptures, with the word translated by a term which signifies immersion, than could have been expected if no separation had taken place.

We are sorry that this explanation has occupied so much space, as to leave us little room for the main object of this discussion. The Bible Society has for thirty years sanctioned a particular mode of writing the name Jesus. It has now taken another view of the case, and considers the old mode "opposed to the mind of the Spirit as revealed in scripture," and has resolved not only to adopt a different mode of spelling it, but to enforce its new views by refusing assistance to the printing of any version in which the new spelling of this word is not adopted. Twenty-seven missionaries of all denominations, have entered their protest against the innovation and are at issue with the Society. What then is to be done? We answer without hesitation, Let the Society yield. It is the strongest party, and there will be magnanimity in the concession. The Society ought to be exceedingly cautious how it creates impediments to the progress of divine truth, by exalting matters of indifference into matters of conscience. Granting that the spelling of the name as adopted by the Society is correct, and that the Missionaries are wrong, still no fundamental doctrine of Christian truth is involved in the mere spelling of our Saviour's name. Whichever mode be adopted, whether it be the old or the new mode, both will be equally understood to designate Jesus Christ, and none other. It is not a matter on which any Society would be justified in splitting with so large a body of disinterested and conscientious labourers. It is far more important that they should continue in active co-operation with the Bible Society, than that the name of Jesus should be spelt with certain letters, and not with others. It is infinitely of more consequence that the Oracles of Divine truth should be given to the heathen, even with what the Society deems the incorrect orthography of this word; than that they should not be given. The Society may have a right to enforce an exact obedience to its own mandate, because it holds the purse strings. But there are a hundred rights which it would be very prudent not to exercise. The whole business of life is managed by a constant compromise between rights and expediency; and we see not why the same wise principle should not be adopted by religious Societies. More mischief will arise to the interests of the great cause from the exercise of this right in the present instance than from leaving it in abeyance; and this ought we think to be a sufficient argument with those who hold in reverence the example of the Apostle who said, "all things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient." Two or three such victories, and the Society is undone. It is not the spirit of the Gospel to contrive new points of difference, and invest them with the importance of conscientious scruples, and thus to separate from each other in affection, zeal, and co-operation, the feeble band of Christian Missionaries already sufficiently bowed down by the difficulties they have to encounter. We have no party interests to serve, as our correspondent is pleased to think, and no sectarian feelings to gratify; but when we see the seeds of dissension thus wantonly sown among Protestant Missionaries and their hands enfeebled by those who ought to strengthen them, we feel constrained to raise our feeble but earnest protest against the folly, we had almost said the guilt, of making the spelling of a word of five letters, a new shibboleth of party.

Steam Ferry.—The subject of the Steam Ferry, a Ditch abortion, has been mooted in some of the papers of late, and we have received a letter from an individual who subscribed for ten shares, enquiring what has become of the funds, now the Society was dead and its assets had been disposed of. We are sorry to be unable to give him any satisfactory information upon the subject. Not having subscribed to any of the city bubbles since we took a share in the Sagor Island Society, we have felt no personal interest in the question, and have not therefore made any particular enquiries. Neither indeed do we know to whom to refer our correspondent. All that is publicly known is, that the affairs of the Society were grossly mismanaged; that it incurred obligations to nearly double the extent of its means, and that the vessels which came out were sold to pay its obligations. As they sold greatly under the cost price, we naturally suppose that the sum realized was just enough to cover the demand from home, and that the subscriptions raised in this country have been absorbed in the loss. We cannot therefore advise any friend who may be in possession of shares to bequeathe them as a provision to his family; they will turn out to be of no more value than the Poyais scrip. But though the funds and the hopes of the subscribers have thus been consigned to the tomb, they have a right at least to ask for a publication of the accounts, that they may have the consolation of knowing how the money has been absorbed; and if either the Secretary or the Treasurer be in India, it is to be hoped that he will come forward and enlighten the public.

A catalogue of the various Joint Stock Associations which have been born within the Ditch, during the last twenty years, and have been consigned to a premature grave almost immediately after they had seen the light, would be both an amusing and instructive document. Indeed the catalogue might be extended so as to embrace all those projects for which the public in general or in particular have been taxed, and which have ended in nothing, but in putting a round sum of money into the hands of particular individuals, sometimes by a legitimate process, at other times by a process of doubtful honesty. We might begin with the subscription for the statue of the Marquis Wellesley, which never reached its destination. We might then touch upon the contributions for sending home a representative to secure the abolition of the half batta order, which did the envoy more good than the army. We might close the list, for the present, with the subscription for the statue of David Hare, of which half is collected, and none appropriated.

The Case of the Moonsiff.—We regret to find that we have been misled by a letter which we published some time since relative to the refusal of a Civil and Session Judge to grant the title of Sahib to a Christian Moonsiff, and have been made the instrument of injustice towards an active and benevolent officer of Government. We have reason to believe that the letter sent to us was forwarded without the knowledge of the Moonsiff, by some officious friend of his. We hasten to make the only reparation in our power, by publishing a correct version of the transaction.

In a proceeding, dated the 6th of April, forwarded to the Judge's Court by the Moonsiff, he laid down the style in which he proposed to address the Native Judges, and then proceeded to prescribe the mode of address to be adopted by other courts in their correspondence with him. The form of address he proposed to use in his communication with the Native Judges, was that laid down by Government in the Circular Order of the 6th of July 1838, but this style is never employed by Courts of inferior jurisdiction in addressing those above them. The style on the other hand which the Moonsiff proposed that the Native Courts should use in addressing him, was the one adopted by those courts in addressing the higher jurisdictions.

An order was passed on this proceeding to the effect, that Government had directed the use of a form of address to be observed by public functionaries in their correspondence with the different subordinate Courts, but that the particular style to be observed by these Courts in addressing each other was regulated by the custom of the country; that no reference on such a subject had ever before been submitted; and that with respect to the particular mode of address claimed by the Moonsiff, the Judge saw no reason to change the usual style which had hitherto prevailed.

The Moonsiff being dissatisfied with this order, made a farther reference on the grounds of his having been addressed by the Judge of Behar in the mode proposed by him.

The Judge willing to concede this point to the Christian Moonsiff, if borne out by precedent, though still of opinion that there should exist no distinctions among the subordinate Judges, addressed the Register of the Sudder Court on the subject. The reply received was to the effect that there appeared no necessity for introducing the term Sahib in the body of a proceeding, and that it was not advisable to make distinctions between the several Moonsiffs. On the receipt of this letter, it was forwarded to the Moonsiff in a private note for his perusal, but as he continued to use the style which he claimed in his proceeding of the 8th April, the Judge sent him a private letter advising him to drop the term, as it added in no wise to his respectability, and only tended to strengthen an ill feeling against him on the part of the other functionaries. To this note a reference was returned for submission to the Superior Court which was again forwarded to the Register, who returned it with his opinion that there appeared no objection to the Moonsiff's employing what term he pleased in designating himself. Thus the matter terminated; the Moonsiff of course continuing to retain the style which he had previously used.

This is altogether a different story from that to which we were led to give credence; and we have only to express our regret that on this occasion we should have overlooked the fact, that one of the first of editorial virtues is—mistrust.

Unavoidable circumstances have obliged us to postpone to the following week, the continuation of the Review of Capt. Eyre's work.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

---

THURSDAY, JUNE 8.

— The vacancy in the Sudder Court in Calcutta has been filled up by the appointment of Mr. E. M. Gordon, the Commissioner of the Dacca Division to the office of Judge. If we look only to personal character, and natural talent, the claims of Mr. Gordon for this office are second to none; but he has had little experience in the Civil Courts, and his constant employment in other departments has left him no leisure for studying the principles of Civil Jurisprudence. This is the fault of the present system, the evils of which become daily more and more apparent, as the older Judges quit the country, and are succeeded by men who have had no advantages of judicial training.

— Letters from Titaliya announce an earthquake as having been felt at that station on the morning of the 2d, which however appears to have done little damage beyond the terror with which it inspired the people.

— The Madras Athenæum of the 27th May states, that on the previous Sunday, when the gale set in, no fewer than fifteen vessels which were riding in the roads, were ordered out to sea by signal from the Master Attendant, of which only three had returned by the 27th. As yet however we have no account of the loss of more than a single barque in the gale.

— Some time ago we had occasion to notice a strange and barbarous decision of the Sudder Court at Bombay, which condemned a Mahomedan convicted of adultery to death, and the offending female to fourteen years imprisonment. The Court appears since to have thought better of the matter. The last Gentleman's Gazette of the 29th May states, that the sentence of both the culprits has been revised, and that they have been condemned to one year's imprisonment without hard labour.

— The Englishman informs us, that cholera had broken out in H. M's. 29th Regiment at Ghazeepore with great violence. It has been attributed to the state of the weather. The deaths at first were as four to five, of the cases admitted; subsequently they were nine to nineteen; and a further diminution of the ratio of mortality of two to six has since been reported.

— The Star alludes to the orders which have been received to equip the Queen Steamer for sea by the beginning of next month, and asks whether Lord Ellenborough is going to Suez. We fancy not. The Madras Government has long requested that a Steam vessel might be placed at its disposal to be employed in communications between that port and the Madras troops stationed in the Straits. It is more than probable that the Queen is destined for this service.

— Mr. George Thompson takes his departure we hear, to-day, for Delhi, to receive his final instructions from his Majesty, previously to proceeding to England as his representative. He travels, notwithstanding the insupportable heat of the weather, by dawk.

— We have extracted from the Star an account of the operations of the Native Hospital, and its dependant dispensaries extracted from its last report. This is one of the oldest of our charitable Institutions, and yet one of the most active and useful. It is more than half a century old, yet retains all the vigour of youth.

FRIDAY, JUNE 9.

— The Hurkaru of this morning has a long and interesting article on Slavery in the Model Republic of modern times, in the course of which the writer alludes to the oft repeated assertion that Jefferson, the American President, who regretted that Jesus Christ was cut off at so early an age, before his genius was fully developed, sold his own children. It has, we know, been said that all the children he had by his female slaves were sent to the slave market at New Orleans, but we have heard the fact stoutly denied by republican friends. Could the Editor lay his finger on any passage which substantiates it?

— The Singapore papers mention, that a neatly lithographed map of the town and environs of Singapore by Mr. Thompson, had just been completed. This is the first successful attempt which has been made in the Straits to lithograph maps.

— The Penang Gazette reports the fatal effects of revenge and jealousy, in a Hajee who had married a pretty Malayan woman. The man seems to have lost none of his ferocity from his visit to the shrine at Mecca. He killed one of her relatives and cut down five others, and wounded his own uncle by mistake in the dark. He then attacked the house of his father-in-law and wounded his own wife and her brother. They would have been killed had not his father-in-law rushed on him and cleaved his skull.

— The Java Courant gives an account of a fearful earthquake, which has nearly destroyed the island of Pulo Nias on the West Coast of Sumatra. [illegible] ed at the same time with the earthquakes [illegible] lla, Singapore and Penang. We have [illegible] ie narrative among our extracts.

[illegible] telligence has been received from China to [illegible] of May. The Emperor had appointed Ke [illegible] succeed Eleepoo as Commissioner for settling [illegible] Tariff, and he was expected shortly at Canton, when the ratified treaty would be delivered him to be conveyed to his Majesty at Pekin. The losses occasioned by the riots at Canton have been made good by the Chinese Government to the extent to which they have been proved. Some of the demands were very suspicious, others were known to be altogether groundless. The settlement of the amount—a very invidious duty—had been committed to the Plenipotentiary. The utmost cordiality continued to prevail between Sir Henry Pottinger and the Chinese authorities, and no little mistrust between his Excellency and the merchants. Smuggling was still carried on in the most barefaced manner in the Canton river. H. M. Ship Samarang, 20, was about to be sent to the Coast of Japan to make a hydrographic survey of it.

— The Calcutta Gazette contains an official letter from Sir James Graham, after he had presented the dutiful and loyal address of the inhabitants of Calcutta to the Queen on the birth of the Prince of Wales. "This additional proof of the faithful attachment of Her Majesty's subjects to her person and family throughout the British dominions, was received by Her Majesty with heartfelt satisfaction."

— The Star quotes Bell's Weekly Messenger, a Tory paper of the 18th March, as saying that Lord Ellenborough's recent proceedings in reducing the Civil expenditure of India, nearly two thirds of a million sterling—will tend to repair his character from the injury inflicted on it by the Somnath Proclamation. Two thirds of a million, about sixty lakhs of Rupees! Where is a reduction of even ten lakhs in the Civil expenditure of India? So much for the accuracy of the organs of public opinion at home.

SATURDAY, JUNE 10.

— The Gentleman's Gazette says, that the Bombay Government, notwithstanding repeated failures, is resolved to try anew the experiment of sending a steamer to Suez right in the teeth of the monsoon. It is much to be doubted whether any steamer on the Bombay establishment is able to face the monsoon.

— On Tuesday night, the 30th May, Lord Ellenborough left Agra to join his Council at Calcutta. No salute was fired, no troops were drawn up; His Lordship entered Agra with all the pomp and parade of a Governor General; he left it like a private gentleman. The Star talks of his moody departure. His Lordship may have come away in no pleasant state of feeling, for he detests Calcutta; but it seems to be forgotten that he had been ill for several days, and that somewhat seriously. It was the first illness of any consequence he has ever experienced.

— The meeting of the British India Society held on Thursday evening was scantily attended, though Mr. Speed took the Chair. We are really surprized to find it mentioned in the report, that the farewell meeting held on the previous Tuesday, to take leave of Mr. Thompson, was attended by only fifteen persons. Nothing seems to have been done at the present meeting beyond a resolution to receive the Report of the Committee appointed to sit on the Act for the appointment of Deputy Magistrates.

— The Star gives the number of emigrants who have left the port of Calcutta for the Mauritius in the month of May last; they amount to 734; of these 633 were men, 91 women, and 10 children; the proportion of women has, we are happy to perceive, considerably increased.

MONDAY, JUNE 12.

— The latest accounts from Scinde are derived from the Delhi Gazette, which states that Sir Charles Napier had determined on disarming the Belochees, a measure which he will not be able to carry into effect without much difficulty, owing to the inefficiency of his force, and the little hold he has on the country. Such a measure however is indispensible to the tranquillity of the province. Shere Mahomed, the refractory chief of Meerpore, was at a place about 42 miles to the north of Hydrabad with about 7000 men. He had offered to make his submission to the British Government on condition that half his jaygeer should be secured to him. The reply was that he must surrender unconditionally. Several very influential chiefs had sent in their submission to the General, and it was expected there would be no more fighting in Scinde. Sir Charles Napier is confidently spoken of as likely to succeed to the post of Commander-in-Chief at Bombay.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that serious differences have arisen between Sir William Nott, the Resident at Lucknow, and the King, but the nature of them has not transpired.

— The Star asks a very pertinent question. All the papers in Calcutta have exhibited the strongest antipathy to Lotteries. How then can any of them, with any consistency of character, continue to assist them by publishing their advertisements? The question is more easily asked than answered. While we are looking for the sanction of the Directors to the entire abolition of all lotteries by a legal enactment, it is the Press alone which can lessen the evil, by refusing to admit advertisements. It is upon the up-country gulls that the projectors of these lotteries depend for support; and the communication with them is entirely in the hands of the Press. Let the press do its duty and clear its columns of these gambling notifications.

TUESDAY, JUNE 13.

— The Portugueze brig Tres Irmos, coming from Mozambique to Bombay, has been totally lost at sea. Ten of the crew remained on the vessel and met a watery grave; fifteen embarked in the cutter, and the same number on a raft, which the cutter towed for some days, but subsequently cut adrift for its own safety, when the whole fifteen went to the bottom. The men in the boat, without water for many days and with only four biscuits a piece for food, were reduced to the last extremity, when a Patimar on its way to Bombay picked them up, and brought them safely into harbour.

— The ice is exhausted at Agra; and the Agra Ukhbar fancies that this circumstance may have driven Lord Ellenborough down to Calcutta, altogether forgetting that our ice is equally out. It was not the warmth of the weather at Agra, rendered more intolerable by the loss of ice, which has sent his Lordship to Calcutta, but the very warm remonstrances of the Home Authorities on his continued absence from his Council. Every one seems to have followed the example of Lord Ellenborough in abandoning the city of Agra. The new Lieutenant Governor, Mr. Clerk, will reside in the Hills; the Secretary Mr. Hamilton, and a large portion of his clerical staff, will proceed to the same destination, and it is said the Oordoo Translator is bound for the same cool retreat.

— A full length portrait of Sir Charles Metcalfe has been executed by Mr. F. R. Say, which appears to have met with unqualified approbation from all who have seen it. It is now proposed to obtain a first rate engraving of the portrait under the immediate supervision of the successful artist; and it is hoped that a large number of subscribers may be obtained to it from the numerous friends of Sir Charles Metcalfe in India. The price is fixed at a goldmohur, and we are happy to perceive that thirty-two names have already been obtained.

— The appointment of Lieut. Col. Richmond to succeed Mr. Clerk as Envoy to the Court of Shere Sing, has excited no little surprise in the country; because it appears to present the first departure of Lord Ellenborough from the sound principle he has acted on of selecting men according to their capacities for the duties committed to them. The Lieut. Col. is a good and gallant officer, who saw a little fighting in the march to Cabul; but to reward such small services with an office of 5000 Rupees a month, and the title of His Excellency, and to place a man absolutely without any political experience whatever in the most important political post in India, seems altogether unaccountable.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14.

— The Bombay papers give us reason to hope for the Mail by the 20th. It was expected to reach Bombay by the 10th. Will the Hindostan beat the express this time also? The Mail is likely to bring news of some moment. The accouchement of her Majesty—the budget—the settlement for the year of the sugar duties—and the issue of the battle between the Church and all those who do not belong to her pale for the control of national education, which was to be fought immediately after Easter.

— The Star has a long article in this morning's paper on the disruption of the scheme which is said to have been formed by a certain party for reducing Calcutta to the condition of a provincial capital, and making the Indus the main channel of communication between England and the Western Provinces. Lord Ellenborough's journey to Calcutta knocks this plan in the head for the rest of his viceroyalty.

— Sir Charles Napier has at length succeeded in establishing a post by land from Hydrabad to Bhooj in Cutch, from whence it will be conveyed to Bombay. The communication by sea is closed by the monsoon for the next two months.

— The Star gives us a couplet which is not amiss, on Sir William Nott's approaching nuptials:

The man who carried off the gates;
Is captive to a Dove.

— We are happy to find that the Prince of Wales, Capt. Denny, in which the Hon. Mrs. Bird embarked, reached the Cape safely on the 27th of March last.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

SINGULAR CASE AT ALLAHABAD.

That the "Rules of the Service," whether that service be the Queen's, or the Company's, must be rigidly adhered to, by each and all subordinate thereto, is a principle which we do not wish to see relaxed in any degree. We never shall complain of obedience to rules, by those upon whom they are imposed. But we may see reason to find fault with those rules upon occasions when the observance of them, produces consequences, that revolt alike against humanity and common sense.

Such in our opinion was the case, (which we extracted from the Hurkaru) in the recent instance of death at Allahabad. An European soldier, it appears, who had purchased his discharge, procured a large quantity of brandy, which he carried on board the boat in which he was to have proceeded to Calcutta, got very drunk, became furious and dangerous, and it was resolved to put him on shore. This was accordingly done, and as his passage had been granted to him free of charge, this was all very proper. However, he resolved, to get back again, and in passing down the ghaut for that purpose, he fell on his forehead, receiving a violent contusion in consequence. In this condition he was taken on board, and a messenger dispatched to the garrison, for medical assistance, and an Assistant Surgeon of the 3d Buffs, in consequence of this application, came on board, but finding that the man did not belong to his, the Surgeon's regiment, he ordered an emetic, and declined further attendance, on the ground that according to the Rules of the Service, he was precluded from rendering further advice or attendance.

In consequence of this determination on the part of the Regimental Surgeon, the poor wretch was bandied about, f om the Steam agents to the Thanah, and from the Thanah to the Charitable Hospital, from thence to the Magistrate, then back again to the Hospital, where he arrived just in time,—to die.

We will go no further into the particulars of this case, because it is not our intention to attach blame to individuals, but to expose a flagrant evil, arising out of the existing Rules of the Service.

Here is an individual, who had but just ceased to be a soldier, who meets with a dangerous accident—and the manner in which that accident occurred, or its occasion, does not effect the question. Nothing but the promptest medical aid can save his life, and yet that life is sacrificed, because Queen's and Company's Surgeons have certain points of etiquette relative to medical attendance on non-military patients, which cannot be surmounted.

Now we cannot forbear our strongest comments upon such a system. We do not, as we said above, attach aught of censure to a Queen's or Company's Medical Officer, for adhering to rules, which it is his duty to adhere to; but that life should in any case be sacrificed to such rules, is, as we said above, revolting to common sense, as well as humanity. Nor can we perceive any possible point of utility to be gained by such prohibiting laws.

If the object be to prevent a Regimental Surgeon, from devoting too much of his time to private practice, under the appearance of attending casualties, it can have no proper application in cases of casualty, of sudden and urgent danger, attendance upon which, would not take a medical man from his regimental duties.

In a word, we can perceive no sound reason for such a prohibition; we cannot discover any good that will result, or can result from it; and although whilst it exists as a rule of the service, we cannot find fault with those who obey it, we think that it manifests an unbecoming and undeserved suspicion, that the common duty of humanity of yielding assistance in case of need, would, if permitted to a medical man, be abused to the detriment of the service.—Englishman, June 14.

THE OPIUM TRADE.

The Hurkaru in a leader published last week, expressed his satisfaction that the opium trade is now placed in imminent peril. "Surely," says our contemporary, "these Lord Ashleys are most inconvenient people." We think so too, for that is the cause they profess to have at heart, though not to the smugglers. There is no way in which a good cause is easier injured, than by exaggeration. When one of these Lord Ashleys comes forward with a proposal for prohibiting the cultivation of the poppy in the fields of British India, on the sole ground that the produce on the plant is occasionally applied to mischievous purposes, when he supports his case by alleging as facts, assertions that are notoriously false, he leaves an impression on all impartial persons that his arguments will not bear an accurate examination. Moreover when we find such a person, talking of religion and morality and being at the same time the organ of two hundred and fifty mercantile firms, whose avowed object is to substitute their own manufactures for the Indian drug in the markets of China, we are naturally inclined to pursue the enquiry a little further, and to doubt whether any higher motive than self interest or the love of notoriety, influences the petitioners and their supporters in the British Senate, when they know that every piece of Cotton goods which they wish to force upon the Chinese, is made from cotton the produce of that slave labour which they affect to hold in abhorrence. We have been for years past steady opponents, both of the monopoly and of the smuggling trade. So long as the latter was left to the Chinese, and the British merchant was merely the carrier of the drug, we considered his share in the transaction as involving no greater moral responsibility than that of a French brandy merchant, or British lace manufacturer, who sell to the contraband dealers of their respective nations. But where the trade began to be carried on by armed vessels under the British flag upon the coast of China, when we heard of a sort of private war carried on by these vessels in order to protect themselves from the Chinese authorities, we unhesitatingly gave our opinion that such a traffic must not be suffered to continue. The British Government has full power of interference in this respect, and if as Sir Robert Peel has declared, it has given instructions for discouraging smuggling, the very first step of that discouragement ought to be the disarming of every British vessel upon the coast of China.

There can be no necessity for arming, in a time of profound peace, by vessels engaged in legitimate commerce, and those who are otherwise employed ought to be compelled to run the additional risk of carrying on their profitable business, without the means of resisting the public authorities of the country whose laws they infringe. Nothing would be easier than this; by the law of England no merchant vessel fitted out in Europe can carry guns without an Admiralty licence. The extension of this law to India would affix confiscation, or a severe penalty, to British vessels found to be armed without permission. The licence in England is given under a bond that no improper use shall be made of the armament, and thus a proved complaint on the part of the Chinese authorities, would be at once visited with punishment. We think the British Government is bound by the comity of nations, to take this very easy step towards preventing bloodshed by its subjects upon a friendly coast. Had one quarter of the violence which has been practiced in China, occurred in any part of Europe, ample redress would long ago have been demanded and conceded.

With regard to the monopoly we have always argued against it, as a mode of raising revenue wholly contrary to sound principles of political economy, and only defensible where no other mode of taxing the commodity could be devised, that would not be of greater inconvenience to the public. It is one of those interferences with the free action of individuals which throws the burden of proving the necessity, entirely upon the Government. But we need not pursue a subject which has so often been argued to demonstration. However, as our columns and those of our Indian contemporaries have hitherto been an armoury out of which orators at home have drawn their best weapons, we will furnish them with another reason for abolishing the monopoly which none of them have yet hit upon, and which Lord Ashley is quite welcome to use, when he next moves the House on the subject.

The monopoly ought then to be opposed by the enemies of the smuggling trade, because it is the greatest facility the smuggler possesses. The Company by their careful inspection of the monopoly drug, their mixing and reducing the whole produce of the season to one uniform quality, make a single ball a fair sample of the whole ten or twelve thousand chests which one of their establishments produces. The consequence is that Company's opium is sold like so much stock, without inspection, whenever the parties dealing are known to each other. Nothing can be more favorable to a smuggling trade than this. The vessels compelled to appear and depart suddenly, to transfer their cargoes into boats at a minute's notice, or to land them under cover of night, cannot submit to that minute inspection which would take place in a state of regular and lawful commerce with an article of variable quality. The effect of this is seen in the Malwa opium, the quality of which is always uncertain, and is therefore far less fit for the coast smuggling trade. If the cultivation in Bengal were private, under an excise or export duty, there would be every variety of quality and the different marks would be differently esteemed like those of tobacco or spirits. Inspection would be necessary, and this would require a secure place of deposit. If this is to be refused at Hong Kong, as appears by Sir Robert Peel's speech, it is evident that the British Government would do more to put down the British smuggling trade in opium by insisting upon the abolition of the Company's monopoly than by any other measure that could be devised.—Eng. June 8.

THE CALCUTTA NATIVE HOSPITAL.

Here it is, with its dependent Dispensaries, having afforded in the space of 13 months relief, medical and surgical to 294,401 cases; at an expence of Co.'s Rs. 44,061—11—6 and there is in hand a balance which encourages its managers to contemplate the further extension of its operations by the establishment of another Dispensary. We can but bid it, God speed, and hope that, despite the fluctuating state of society in Calcutta, noted at the opening of the Report, its support will continue steady and increasing. And here it occurs to us to remark that such an Institution might be, and ought to be independent of the fluctuating state of society in Calcutta. Did but the wealthy Native residents imitate more largely, as they ought to do, the largest of the European, it would be so. Some of them have indeed set the example nobly, as may be seen in p. 11 of the Report, where mention is made of three donations, one of Sa. Rs. 20,000 and two of Sa. Rs. 1,000 each, by Rajah Buddinath Roy, Rajah Sibchunder Roy, and Rajah Nursingchunder Roy, in 1825. These three gentlemen were the first natives who were elected Governors. We doubt not but that since then, others have been largely liberal too, but, looking at the list of the present contributors, the native gentlemen exhibit but a sorry figure, compared with what the Native Community might do, and, we hesitate not to say, ought to do.—Calcutta Star, June 8.

CHINA—MOVEMENTS OF THE BAPTIST MISSION.

The following is an extract of a letter just received from Hongkong, dated May 4th.—We are glad to see the Church in China has such bright prospects:—"Our cause here is evidently progressing, and we have large congregations both Chinese and foreign. At our last baptism, two Chinese and one foreigner were baptised. You have heard of the death of Mrs. Dean, after one week's dreadful illness of small pox, leaving a bereaved husband and an infant daughter. The final settlement of political affairs in China seems to be wonderfully tardy, and the end is not yet. The Baptist Mission has recently had a valuable accession in the arrival of Dr. Macgowan—he is of New York and will likely be stationed with Mr. Dean at Foo-chow-foo. The distribution of our Missionary doctors now in China will be as follows:—Dr. Hobson at Hongkong; Dr. Parker at Canton; Dr. Cumming, at Amoy; Dr. Macgowan at Foo-chow-foo; and Dr. Lockhart at Shanghae. Rev. Mr. Shuck is stationed at Hongkong, but the others are not yet settled, with the exception of the Rev. Mr. Brown, of the Moravian Education Society, who is also at Hongkong."—Calcutta Christian Advocate.

ACCOUNT OF AN EARTHQUAKE AT PULO NIAS.

Ignorant of the dismal scenes on which it would rise the next morning, the sun sunk peaceably beneath the Goenong Sie Toli (Island of Nias) on the evening of the 5th January last.

At 6 P. M. the Thermometer (Fahrenheit) marked 83° the sky was clear, the sea calm, the air pleasant and mild—only a breeze from the westward (a circumstance of rare occurrence in those parts) was felt.

The inhabitants of Nias, not aware of the fate that awaited them were enjoying the repose of sleep when at about midnight they were roused by heavy shocks of the earth which at first were felt in a slight degree from the west shifting to the northward, but became every moment more violent, so that at last no fixed direction could be given to them the shocks subsiding into a complete trembling of the earth so that at every instant it was expected that the whole Island would disappear.

The shocks continued without intermission during 9 minutes, the ground was moved up and down, like the rocking of a swing,—to stand up or walk was alike impossible, houses were destroyed burying beneath the ruins their ill fated inhabitants.

A portion of the mount Horiffa close to Goenong Sie Toli together with the fortifications of the Benting, and the other government buildings with the exception of the Barracks and the Commandant house were totally destroyed. Coco and other large trees which for upwards of a century had withstood the hand of time were torn up by the roots, and the ground divided itself shewing deep yaning chasms from which trickled a blackish frothy liquid.

No subterraneous noises were heard being probably drowned by the dreadful dim of falling mountains, houses and trees, joined to the thrilling shouts of the population.

After nine minutes passed in the fear of immediate destruction the inhabitants began gradually to recover from the trance in which they lay plunged by this sudden calamities—people appearing from beneath the ruins of a house or from an abyss into which they had been plunged the one to save an aged mother, the other his helpless child.

The dreadful scene was lift up by the most beautiful sky and sparkling stars.

Not long the unfortunate Islanders were permitted to exult in the hope of their miraculous [illegible]e.

[illegible]ain the earth began to tremble and repeated [illegible]s were felt with new force.

[illegible]ddenly a tremendous wave rose from the [illegible]west and with awful noise, spreading itself [illegible] that part of the coast, bore every thing before it, sweeping away men, women, cattle, houses, and even whole villages, so that in a single moment the same spot where cattle were grazing had become the abode of fishes.

The large Campong Mego, about 1 Dutch Mile south of Goenong Sie Toli was entirely washed away by this wave and many days afterwards the dead bodies of the victims of this woeful destruction might be seen on the beach.

The wave penetrated into the neighbourhood of Goenong Sie Toli, with such violence that the prows boaying in the river were thrown upon the shore 100 to 160 paces from their anchorage. Among the number was the government cruising schooner No. 23.

The new Bazar consisting of wooden houses and situated on the left side of the river was also entirely washed away.

The inhabitants who escaped, fled to the Benting 60 to 100 feet above the sea, to implore the succour of others as miserable as themselves.

This Phenomenon continued until half past four in the morning, the shocks being felt at intervals of 2 minutes when another Earthquake was experienced, which, even more violent than the first one, continued for about 6 minutes. The shocks generally came from the west going to the north, changing however directly to the south.

The trembling of the ground, although more slightly was felt for several days afterwards.

The authorities here have immediately caused the necessary measures to be taken, and despatched a government vessel to give assistance to the unfortunate inhabitants of the Island of Nias.—Translated from the Java Courant, April 5th, 1843.

LETTER FROM MAJOR JERVIS, RELATIVE TO HIS GREAT WORK, ON THE GEOGRAPHY AND STATISTICS OF ASIA.

To the Editors of the Calcutta Christian Observer.

SIRS,—I consider it my bounden duty, after the generous and unanimous expression of the public press, recommendatory of the great work I had proposed to undertake on the Geography and Statistics of Asia, and of the capacity and fitness of the projector to do it every justice, to afford the most explicit account of my proceedings, and to explain the causes which have hitherto precluded the possibility of its fulfilment. I was honoured with subscribers to the number of about three hundred of the most distinguished persons in India, before I quitted it in January 1842; the list I beg to enclose. I purposed then to publish the work in a somewhat different form, which after much consultation with many eminent persons in this country, as well as publishers and parties thoroughly conversant with such matters, I have been obliged to modify. Messrs. Longman and Co., Messrs. Adam Black and Co of Edinburgh, in regard to that plan stated that experience had shown that to proceed on any alphabetical plan or any prescribed systematic general outline, the whole work would frequently be delayed for months, and the public be grievously discouraged and disappointed in waiting for some indolent or perhaps sick person, to fill up the intermediate necessary portion before proceeding with that which was to follow. This has compelled me to adopt another course, and in so doing I have no hesitation in affirming that the whole work will be far more acceptable, reasonable in cost, entertaining and practicable in execution. I propose to publish six numbers or rather volumes in the course of the year, each not less than 300 pages; they may be more, and they may contain 400 pages as circumstances shall allow; and to prevail with parties to subscribe, I have fixed the price at the low cost of 36 Rupees per annum in advance in India, or 3guineas in advance in England, on delivery of the first number—with the guarantee that if the work be not forthcoming, the money will be returned. Each number to have one or more maps or embellishments of some sort. The original preposition was about £10 or one hundred Rupees to subscribers for four or six volumes royal octavo, or about 25 to 32 shillings per volume, so that the present plan and terms are considerably more advantageous to subscribers, allowing for the quantity of matter.

When I first put forth the prospectus, Messrs. Ostell and Lepage, at the suggestion of the latter, proposed to undertake the publication themselves, but the late Mr. Ostell considered it so large an undertaking that a copartner, a publisher of note was essential and indispensable. In course of correspondence therefore I communicated with the two leading publishers of geographical works in London and Edinburgh, Messrs. Longman and Co. and Messrs. Adam Black and Co. The late Mr. Longman individually most warmly and nobly espoused the cause and did all in his power to promote its publication conjointly with some other party—but his partners not agreeing, this resource failed. Messrs. Adam Black and Co in still stronger terms expressed their approval, but declined taking up the subject till they had completed Professor Napier's Encyclopædia Britannica, on which they had laid out all their disposable capital, but stated that when that was through the press, they would gladly take the whole, on certain stringent conditions. By these as by those suggested by Longman, the work, as far as the Indian public was concerned, would have been a regular made-up book, defective in that accurate, complete and essential information which was required in supersession of the old accounts of Hamilton and Co. All the materials were to be put in perfect readiness and completeness into their hands, they were to clip, alter and dispose of them as they thought proper, have all the arrangements of publication, printing, &c. in their own hands and in fact for all purposes of real usefulness, any one else might with equal propriety have supplied my place of editor. Others suggested various old by-gone authorities and worn-out materials as the foundation for many a good running page of matter—in fact such a work I should have been quite ashamed to put my name to, or have any concern with. Mr. Longman's melancholy death, Mr. Ostell's demise also after a protracted illness, shut up the door of hope, after the long and able negociations carried on with them and other parties previous only to my arrival in England by a most faithful and valued friend. How to proceed without publisher, coadjutor or help of any kind—how to redeem the pledge in some sort given to the Indian public was a subject of the deepest concern to me. I was counselled by my respected friend and helper in India, the Rev. Dr. Duff, to put forth a full statement of all my difficulties and peculiar circumstances before I left the shores of India, and retire, for a season at least, with a good grace. Dr. Wilson of Bombay felt assured the public in India were sufficiently interested in the work to come forward and enable me to carry out the original design without recourse to booksellers or publishers for aid, or capital.—I have waited however, and I hope not without good reason, till I had obtained full information of what could be accomplished in England. With the help of my own lithographic press, by conducting all the details under my own eye, I am enabled to get the maps and any embellishments that may be required done at the least practicable cost, in the most beautiful and accurate style, and by managing the printing and publication wholly myself I am saved all the intermediate charges of a third party.

Instead of proceeding either alphabetically as proposed by Mr. Ostell, or on the plan that at first occurred to me, I have undertaken to give a series of highly interesting and various memoirs, voyages and travels—selected and elegantly translated from the French, Russian, German, Italian, Portuguese, Dutch, and Oriental languages, with occasional reprints of scarce English works and other original matters. These, with good notes and prefatory dissertations, will furnish my countrymen with a large fund of valuable information from quarters perfectly sealed up to the generality of readers; and to the authorities some important matter of immediate consequence to the public interests which otherwise could not be obtained. I propose, for instance, in the course of the first year to publish Count Hilmerson's description of Khiva from the Russian archives at Orenburg, together with Baron Meyndorff's Bokhara, Mouravier's Khiva, from the French, and Count Graperg da Hamso's papers on Central Asia from the Italian. These with Baron Humboldt's, Gebler's and Ehrmanns' papers on the Altac Thianshan will throw some light on the geography of Central Asia. These are all ready for the press—also Baron Hugel's Cashmere from the German; Vincenzo Maria's voyage overland from Rome to India, and back, through Syria, and Persia, by the Mediterranean—from the Italian; Spassky's and Kraschininni Koff's account of the frontiers of Siberia, China and Tartary from the Russian. In the course of my publication I hope to devote a separate volume or two to a particular account of the Presidencies of Bombay, Calcutta, Madras, Agra and Ceylon.—Her Majesty's Government have honoured me by handing me a most curious original map of Pekin, the only one supposed to have ever reached England—to have a few fac similes struck off for Her Majesty's Government—the remainder to be freely available for my Memoirs. I trust therefore the subscribers who honoured me with their names in the first announcement of my Prospectus, will see no reason to abandon me or decline assent to the reduced and modified plan and terms now proposed. The first lithographic specimen I have turned out of my press,—the Island of Bombay—and which in truth procured for me the privilege of adding the name of Victoria to my Memoirs, has been pronounced by the most competent judges to be far superior to any thing of the kind, in elegance, and execution, that has ever appeared in England. Of this I hope to forward many copies by the next Overland Mail, and if practicable the first part of Memoirs.—To cover even necessary expenses, at least 600 subscribers would be required.

In regard to the map of Asia (which is a perfectly distinct work, and preparing in nine sheets on a scale of about one inch to a degree), I have come forward as a professional Geographer, humbly yet resolutely proposing to follow on the steps of the great Rennel; and so to arrange and publish the very best materials that I can command by the favour of the British Government, the Honourable Court of Directors; and all possible sources public and private to which I am allowed access, as shall commend my services hereafter regularly to all who wish well to science and the progress of his civilization.

My labours are honoured by the distinguished patronage of his Royal Highness Prince Albert—the Duke of Cambridge and other great personages; but none shall I value so highly as that of my fellow-countrymen and brother officers in India, amongst whom I have so long lived and to whom I am better known. It is to them I appeal; as to the Honourable Court of Directors I look for my best support.

I am, Sirs, your obedient servant,

T. B. JERVIS.

To Correspondents.

We must respectfully decline the publication of the letter K. N. relative to the Hindoo College. It would bring on an unpleasant, angry, profitless discussion.

Our good friend Herman Donsterswiccl shall appear next week. We think the subject is one that will keep.

We will endeavour to bring the letter about the Magistrates into a reasonable compass, and give it next week. Why will not our correspondents remember that brevity is the soul of wit?

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LATE CAPT. GUTHRIE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your Editorial paragraph in the Friend of India of the 25th instant, referring to the death of the late Captain Guthrie of the Invalids, I beg permission to inform you that he held no Staff Appointment in Dinapore, though I believe he held a Civil Appointment at Patna, at a distance of at least seven miles from this station; he was therefore under the care of a Civil Surgeon, who must have granted him a sick leave to Calcutta on his own responsibility, as the Dinapore Standing Station Medical Committee, I am prepared to say, were not consulted on the subject.

Yours obediently,

Dinapore, 30th May, 1843. H. B. H.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY'S NEW LAW.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—It is much to be regretted that, as you could not find time to discuss the subject which I lately brought to your notice regarding the Bible Society, you should have touched it at all under the influence of the feelings which dictated your article on Thursday last. It is difficult, perhaps impossible for us to view any subject aright, while our minds labour under the influence of party feelings, prejudice, or irritation of any kind. Having a high respect for your judgment on such matters, but knowing at the same time, where your weakness lay, I hinted to you the propriety of a friendly discussion of this subject irrespective of the Baptist question, as I know well that the least approach to that questio vexata, would distort your judgment. I am sorry that you did not attend to my hint, for had you done so, your opinions would have carried much more weight, and your article would have been very different in tone and spirit, even although it had been the same as to substance. It is evident that you wrote under the irritating influence which a recollection of the controversy between the Bible Society and the Baptist body, could not fail to produce, otherwise you would not have treated the subject so cavalierly as you have, (a fault which I must in justice say, is very unusual in the pages of the Friend.) The Author of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, in one place of his writings represents the controversy which agitated Christendom in the third century as a mere difference about the spelling of a word, i. e. 'Ομουσιος or 'Ομοιουσιος and thus labours to throw ridicule upon the whole subject. According to you, the difference between the Calcutta Bible Society and some of the Mofussil Missionaries is merely about the spelling of a word, and hence you call the controversy, "The Calcutta Bible Society's spelling law, and their spelling mania." Now, Sir, were it not for the high respect which I have for your general fairness, I would call this a controversial trick. It is one way indeed of getting rid of an opponent, but it is a course which I am sure you would not knowingly adopt. There are those however, who will not be disposed to regard the matter so leniently as I do, for you have laid yourself open, unwittingly I believe, to a very serious charge. The point in dispute, as you must be aware, is not about the mere spelling of a word, it is not so regarded either by the one party or the other. It would appear that the Bible Society regard the employment of any other term besides يسوع as opposed to the mind of the Spirit as revealed in Scripture, this is a very serious matter.

The present question is just one of those which may occur between a Bible Committee and a translator, and I have not the least hesitation in resting the defence of the Bible Society's proceed on the issue of this very question. How stands the matter, it is thus. The Committee maintain that the term يسوع is etymologically expressive of the declaration of the Angel in Matt. i. 21, and that it alone expresses the sense of the Scriptures. On the other hand, it is not pretended that the term عيسى signifies any thing, and it is tacitly admitted that any other term would do as well. The argument from etymology is not even attempted to be replied to (I do not enter into the arguments on either side, but merely state the facts of the case). Are the Committee then to be compelled to publish with their sanction that which they believe to be contrary to the mind of the Spirit? Some of the Mofussil Missionaries object to the employment of the term يسوع simply because of the probable evil consequence of the change among Musulmans; that is, one party have conscientious scruples to the employment of any other term, the other oppose the change on the ground of expediency. This being the case, I leave it to you to say which ought to give way.

In regard however to the Urdu version which has given rise to this controversy, and which is just issued from the press, (and how thankful ought we to be, that we have now for the first time a correct version of the whole of the Scriptures in that widely spread language), you seem to be utterly at fault. There is no dispute in this cause between the Committee and the translators, they are quite agreed, in fact the spelling of the Redeemer's name now adopted was the proposal of the translators themselves, one of whom is a Missionary from the Mofussil, and admitted to be one of the best Urdu Scholars in the whole Missionary body. There is therefore now a new element brought into this controversy, the dispute is not now between the Committee and translators, but between the Committee and translators on the one hand, and some of the distributors and readers of the Bible on the other. Are both translators and Committee to be borne down by this third party? What Committee would or could work in such circumstances?

It is not my intention to enquire into the relevancy of the arguments employed in the protest published by you, I may however remark that it appears very strange that the very arguments which have been fully met and answered in the Calcutta Christian Observer, should be reiterated in the form of a protest, without any notice being taken of the reply. There is one thing which I may be excused for urging on the framers of the protest, I think that a regard to justice and truth requires that wherever the protest is sent, it ought to be accompanied by the statements and replies on the other side. If this be done, the Calcutta Bible Society will have little occasion for anxiety as to the result. The evils arising from the separation of the Baptist body from the Bible Society are not so great as you seem to represent them. The Bible Society have lost no translators thereby, for at the present moment the Calcutta Baptist Missionaries have, with a commendable liberality, agreed to publish an edition of the Bengalee Scriptures for the Society, and another Baptist Missionary is now carrying an edition of the Uriya Scriptures through the press for the Society and these acts of friendly feeling and liberality are appreciated and reciprocated by the Calcutta Bible Society, of which, by the way, Baptist Missionaries are still members. Allow me further to inform you that you labour under a mistake if you suppose that the gentlemen who have signed the protest, agree with you as to the step taken by the Society in reference to the Baptist question. The most of them, I believe quite approve of the course pursued by the Society in that matter, and some of them, I have occasion to know, were among the first to defend the Society.

In conclusion, allow me to state that I am alone responsible for what I have written on this subject. The Calcutta Bible Committee have nothing to do with any thing I have written, and in fact none of its members know that I now address you,—this explanation I deem necessary, for from some remarks made by you on a former occasion, it might be supposed that I wrote under authority. I shall be happy to see either yourself or some of your correspondents discuss this subject candidly and impartially, and apart from all party feeling, in fact to grapple with the simple question, what is the duty of a Bible Society in reference to the publication of Scripture translations. If this be done in the spirit of kindness and christian love, I think our views will approximate each other much more closely than we imagine. Let the writers place themselves in the position of the members of a Bible Committee, and enquire what they ought to do when such questions as the one now before us is to be decided.

A MEMBER OF THE CALCUTTA BIBLE SOCIETY.

FRENCH OCCUPATION OF TAHITI.—When the British Government, in the reign of George IV., declined to assume the sovereignty of the Georgian Isles, agreeably to the request of King Pomare, it was mutually understood, that the King might rely upon the friendship, and, if necessary, the protection of this country, with which he manifested such anxiety to cultivate the closest relations. Neither the sovereign nor the people have ever done anything to forfeit their claim to be protected in asserting their independence. For many years, a British, a French, and an American Consul have resided at Tahiti; and no disagreement of a political or commercial nature, so far as we are aware, has ever occurred between the representatives or the traders of the different nations.

The success of the British Protestant Missionaries in evangelizing the simple natives of the Polynesian Cythera and the adjacent Archipelago, has, however, long been a source of malignant vexation and jealousy to the Romish Propagandists, more especially to the College of Jesuits at Valparaiso, who appear to be the prime instigators of the repeated outrages committed by the French commanders in the South Seas. The first affair of the kind was the outrageous conduct of the commander of the French frigate Venus, in 1838; the pretext for which was the alleged refusal of the Queen and Government of Tahiti to allow the settlement on their island of certain Romish priests. In the following year, a second infraction of the rights of the Island was perpetrated by Captain La Place, of the frigate Artemise, of 64 guns, and a crew of 450 men, under circumstances of peculiar aggravation. On her voyage to the Sandwich Islands, the Artemise struck on a reef about twelve miles eastward of Point Venus, Tahiti. The vessel sustained so much damage, that it was with great difficulty she was brought into Papeete Harbour, to be hove down for repairs; and eighty of the natives were employed at the pumps, night and day, for more than a month. When she was again afloat, the Commander convened a meeting of the Chiefs, for the professed purpose of thanking them for the kind assistance they had rendered in repairing his ship and protecting his property, but, in reality, to demand the abrogation of their law prohibiting the erection of chapels and the instruction of the people in the Roman Catholic faith. With this requisition the natives were forced to comply, as Capt. La Place threatened to fire upon the town, and to devastate the Island in case of refusal.

The vessel then proceeded to the Sandwich Islands, and exacted from the King and his people the sum of 25,000 dollars for a similar offence; that is to say, for their refusal to receive Popish missionaries; with a threat to carry war throughout their country, unless the laws forbidding their admission were instantly repealed.

The recent affair of the Marquesas was in pursuance of the same system. And now we find Admiral Dupetit Thouars taking possession of Tahiti, under the pretext of a tender of the sovereignty of the Island by the Queen and the principal Chiefs to the King of the French. We are not yet in possession of all the details of this infamous transaction, but may state generally, that the accounts given by the French Papers are wilfully false. The Queen, instead of being willing to place the Island under French protection, refused to sign the Treaty till the last hour of the four and twenty which were allowed her by the French ruffian, under the threat of bombarding the Island if she did not comply with the insolent demand. The conduct of the French Admiral is eulogized in terms of the highest satisfaction in the Chilian Journals; but at present, it is unauthorised by the French Government; and we are not without hope that the representations which have already been made by our Ministers to M. Guizot, will lead to the disavowal of an act which must otherwise inevitably lead, sooner or later, to a hostile collision between the two countries The indication which the whole series of outrages affords, of the activity and audacious policy of the Romish Propagandists, is the most striking and most alarming feature of the case; and it will show the Protestants of America, as well as of Great Britain, what they have to look for, if they suffer the deep-laid schemes of Rome and Oxford to advance unopposed.—Pat.

TAHITI TO THE FRIENDS OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN, OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.—CHRISTIAN BRETHREN,—An event has occurred which cannot but make a deep impression on all our hearts.

For many years past, we have been accustomed to contemplate, with much delight and thankfulness, the success of the Gospel of our common Lord and Saviour in the South Sea Islands. We have witnessed the total renunciation of idolatry, and the adoption, in its stead, of the worship of the true and living God; we have beheld, with delight, the communication to them, in their own tongue, of the pure word of God, and the readiness with which they received it; we have beheld the march of Christianity from island to island, and from groupe to groupe; and we have had to witness this progress as obtained, under God, as the price of the blood of some eminent servants of the Lord of Missions.

At length, in the inscrutable wisdom of the Head of the Christian Church, a dark cloud has been permitted to come upon, and to threaten to settle itself over this bright spot in the western hemisphere of Christian Missions. The French Government has, under the most false pretences, by an act of unjustifiable violence, taken political possession of the island of Tahiti, with the declared purpose of securing with its own domination that also of the Church of Rome. More needs not be said, nor can more be needed, to call forth the combined feeling of all Protestant Christians in deploring the event, and in resolving to employ, to the utmost, their combined energies in averting it, if possible.

The London Missionary Society, as that body of Christians which is the most nearly interested in the calamitous event, has properly placed at the head of its efforts to obtain from the Government concerned the needed redress, earnest supplication to the King of kings, for his interposition, and for his direction and blessing on their intended endeavours to obtain from the French Government, and, as they hope, through the influence of our own, a relinquishment of the ill obtained possession. It is understood that the Sand-[illegible]slands, the seat of an American Mission, have [illegible]serated from a similar aggression and threaten-[illegible]ldom, and their independence acknowledged, [illegible] the energetic intervention of the American [illegible]ent.

[illegible]day evening next is pointed out as the special [illegible] for this concert of prayer and supplication. Let [illegible]deed, be a widely and energetically combined [illegible] to the Heavenly Throne, such as the world, and even the Church herself, has rarely, if ever, witnessed! Let the energies of prayer be evinced, and no doubt its potency will, through the Divine faithfulness, be made apparent. W. A. H.—Pat.

South Sea Missions in Danger.—The nefarious conduct of the French Admiral in taking possession of Tahiti and the Society groupe, for the purpose of converting the Protestant Missionary Stations there into Popish Missions,—for this is unquestionably the main object,—appears to have excited a deeper and stronger feeling of grief and indignation among the Evangelical Protestants of France, than has hitherto manifested itself among ourselves. The Semeur (of March 22) has a leading article on the subject, in which the character of the transaction and its consequences are very forcibly exposed. The Archives du Christianisme eloquently expatiates on the outrage. The Committee of the Paris Society of Evangelical Missions has held a special meeting on the occasion. The subject has been mooted in both Chambers; by Count Pelet de la Lozere in the Chamber of Peers, and by Count Agenor de Gasparin in that of the Deputies. The reply of M. Guizot intimates, that the French Government, in the words of the article in the Archives, is resolved to be intolerant in the name of Toleration, tyrannical (violent) in the name of Liberty." Our fellow Protestants in Paris connect the conduct of their Government, in this instance, with the policy pursued in Syria, and even at home also. "One can easily perceive in it," they say, "the working of a fixed plan for humbling Protestantism every where, and which tends to isolate us, as French Protestants, from the interests of our country, and to cause us to be looked upon as strangers. But the Protestants of France will take care it shall be known, they are as attached to their country as to their faith. It is under contemplation to send French Protestant Missionaries to Tahiti and the Sandwich Islands. Then the French Protestants may say with reason, that, in doing violence to the Protestant faith of the natives, it is not only the labours of their brethren it is sought to injure, but likewise those of their fellow-countrymen." The Semeur takes the same view of this outrage upon the Protestant faith. "It is not necessary to tell the French Protestants," says this Journal, "to whom on this occasion they are sacrificed; they know and feel that this act, which it is sought to pass off as simply anti-English, is essentially anti-Protestant. It is not England that is wounded; it is the Protestantism of France, the Protestantism of the whole world. The baseness and perfidy of the Minister, himself nominally a Protestant, in sanctioning the piratical act of the Admiral, has awakened the strongest disgust. M. Guizot has, indeed, not scrupled to avow, that he prefers the interests of France to those of Protestantism; a speech worthy of a man who has, on all occasions, postponed principle to expediency, the tool of every tyrant he has served, under every shifting régime, and the implacable enemy of the cause which he has betrayed.

The sympathy which the Friends to Protestantism and the Missions in France have manifested on this occasion, does honour to their heads and their hearts. What must they think, however, of the apparent tameness and indifference of the Christian public in this country? With what astonishment, not to say contempt, must they read the cold, formal, unsatisfactory notice of the subject in the British Parliament; especially if they give our Ministers credit for really placing any reliance upon the delusive assurances of their own Government, which can deceive nobody in France? Could we believe our Ministers capable of such ignorance, folly, and heartlessness, as their answers, taken literally, would imply, no language could be too strong to reprobate their conduct. But, as we have already intimated, we are unwilling to come to this conclusion. Lord Aberdeen has not yet, he says, "precise information." We shall, therefore hope that, when his mind is disabused of the very strange misapprehension which at present seems to becloud his views of the transaction, he will adopt a course more worthy of a British Minister and a Protestant statesman.—Pat.

Independent Missionary Churches.—Sooner or later, and the sooner the better, it may be hoped that those Missionary stations which may be considered as Colonial, rather than as belonging to the sphere of Foreign Missions, will be in a condition to support themselves, and consequently to claim the correlative right of managing their own affairs. This is now the case with the Baptist Missions in Jamaica; and we are glad to find an example set in Demerara, of genuine Scriptural Independency, by the Congregational church originally planted by the London Missionary Society in that Colony.—Ibid.

The Holy Basin.—(From a Correspondent.)—At a village not 10 miles from Shrewsbury there resides a clergyman professedly Evangelical, whose horror of Dissent some have been uncharitable enough to suppose may be accounted for by the fact that, prior to his connexion with the Establishment, he made an unsuccessful attempt to gain admission into a Dissenting College. This gentleman, to whom Puseyism presents many and powerful points of attraction, was recently (on the 2nd Feb., 1843.) requested to baptize the child of a poor couple living at a little distance from the village. On arriving at their cottage, and not finding a suitable vessel for containing the water, he desired the woman to go and borrow a basin, and to bring the worst she could obtain, as he intended to break it. The poor people were very naturally puzzled to comprehend why the basin was to be demolished. At the conclusion of the service, however, the necessity for its destruction was thus explained: He informed his wondering auditors that he had been ordained by a bishop, who had conveyed to him a sacred influence, that he also had the power of communicating that influence, that by placing his hand over the basin he had made both it and the water holy, and that it would be a sinful act to use either one or the other for common or ordinary purposes. Hence, to prevent the commission of so fearful a crime, he directed a boy to accompany him into the garden with a spade. A hole was dug, into which he first poured the water, and then, breaking the basin, threw in the fragments, giving strict orders to the lad to beat them small, and to cover the whole carefully up.—Ibid.

Western Academy.—We are sorry to learn that this Institution, as well as most of our Academies, in consequence of an inadequate income, is in pecuniary difficulties, and that the treasurer will be in town this week for the purpose of soliciting assistance from the friends of an educated Dissenting ministry.—Ibid.

Interesting Opening amongst the Hill Tribes in Arracan.—Dec. 6, 1841. Br. Stilson with his family arrived this morning. We had been anxiously looking for them for several days, and their arrival gives us more pleasure than I can express. About ten months since br. Comstock with his family came up, and remained with us seventeen days, during which time we visited the old city of Arracan and a number of villages, preaching the gospel to many hundreds of people. I may as well state here the object of Mr. Stilson in coming up to Akyab just at the present time. It is to accompany me on a visit to a body of "wild people" (as they are called) who inhabit the mountains north of this. In my former communication to the Board I have mentioned frequent interviews with a Mountain Chief and some of his people, and his request to have schools established and to be taught the knowledge of God. On my return from Calcutta I wrote to Mr. Stilson, proposing that he should come to Akyab and go with me, so as to ascertain whether the language was the same, or nearly so, with that spoken by Khyiens, or a distinct language; and if distinct, whether the people were sufficiently numerous to warrant the labour and expense of studying it, adopting an alphabet and giving them books. As Mr. Stilson had already reduced the Khyien language to writing, he would be able to form a correct judgment as to the identity of the language. He and Mr. Comstock approved of my proposition, and I have been anxiously waiting his arrival. The Mountain Chief, too, unexpectedly arrived to-day; he came with nine of his people. I had not seen him before, since the last of July.

7. The chief and his people called twice during the day. He gave me a paper written by some Burman under his direction. It is a petition for me to visit his people and teach them, and also an account of some murderous collision between two villages fifty or sixty miles further north. Mr. Stilson wrote down a good many words. When informed that we were making preparations to go to his country, he appeared to be greatly delighted.

29. Last Saturday we returned, having accomplished all we had anticipated, and I will now give a hasty sketch of our journey and our interview with that people.

Events of the journey.—We crossed the specious harbor and entered the Ko-la-dan, a broad and noble river which has its sources in the Yuma mountains far to the north. After ascending the Ko-la-dan between seventy and eighty miles, we left all Burman population, and entered the Kemmee country. The change in the scenery is not less striking than the change in the character, habits, and manners of the people. For the last seventy miles before it empties its waters into the Akyab harbor, the Ko-la-dan flows through a vast tract of level plain, dotted with villages in every direction. Rice fields are extensive,—in many places as far as the eye can reach. Here and there are dark tangled forests. There are no fences, no hedges. Occasionally we see small patches of tobacco, and a few gourds and plantains, and besides this there is no cultivation, although the soil is exceedingly rich, and capable of producing every kind of plant and vegetable peculiar to warm latitudes. The delta for twenty-five or thirty miles inland is intersected by innumerable creeks lined with various kinds of mangroves, which give the country a sombre aspect; and is a great laboratory of the most deadly fevers. When about thirty miles from the sea there is a slight elevation of the land, and mountains appear in the distance, but still there is little change in the aspect of the country. When we leave the plains we leave also the Burman, or as they are called in Arracan, the Mug population. First we came to low ranges of hills, but every ten miles we ascended, the hills became larger and were clothed with dark tangled forests to the very summit. The river is still broad and deep—it makes a few curves, but its general course is exactly from north to south. As we were anxious to reach the village where the chief lives, with as title delay as possible, we visited only one of the numerous Kemmee villages along the river. It was about 10 in the morning; the boatmen were cooking the rice on the bank of the river—the forest came down to the very water's edge, and the only indication of their being a village at hand, was a small landing-place and a smooth, well-trod path leading up the steep bank. Mr. Stilson and I took this path, and after walking about four or five hundred yards, came to a village of seventeen houses surrounded by a neat and well constructed stockade. The gate was open and we went in, but saw no human being. After standing a few minutes in order to give no unnecessary alarm, and admiring the peculiar structure of their houses,—the neat and orderly manner in which they were placed,—that is, in two rows, so as to have a broad street running through the centre,—we passed on, and finally went out at the gate on the opposite end of the village, and found ourselves standing on the bank of a noisy little brook—an object of great interest to us, as it was the first of the kind we had seen in Arracan. We saw abundance of pigs, goats and fowls, and began to wonder where the inhabitants could be, as we saw none and did not hear a human voice. We suspected, what in the end turned out to be true, that the men were in their fields at a distance, while the females and children, ascertaining that extraordinary looking strangers were at the landing, had fled in a panic to the jungles. We were sorry to alarm them, but still did not feel willing to go away till we could see them, and give them every assurance that we were friends. While examining two or three peculiar trees which grew on the margin of the brook, a female with a child slung on her back, rose up out of the grass but a few feet from us. She appeared to be paralyzed with fear, and the poor little urchin on her back was afraid to look up. We could not help reflecting on the wrong and outrage which have reduced such a feeling of dread at the appearance of strangers—more terrifying than the midnight growl of the most ferocious beasts of prey. We stepped back and spoke soothingly to the poor woman, assured her, again and again, that she had nothing to fear; and she evidently believed us, for in a little time she went into the village. Probably on the first alarm one or more had been despatched to give intelligence to the men, for they soon began to come in, and then the females came from their hiding places, each one with a child slung on her back, and many of them with three or four or half a dozen older children following them. The men came and sat down around us, while the females and children remained at a distance, or went up into their houses. Some of the men could understand Burman, and speak it tolerably well. We soon perceived, however, that they could not sound the final consonant, or the th, to which they always gave the sound of s. We explained to them our design in coming into their country—that it was in obedience to the command of God, to visit all nations and instruct them in his holy word. They appeared to be much interested; said they should be glad to have books, and understand those things of which we told them. After returning to our boat, several of the men came down and wished us to accept of a fowl which they brought.

The next day, in the morning, we came to the mouth of the river Moe, a fine stream which comes in from the north-east, and is from fifty to sixty yards broad. Up this river about six miles, we came to the village where the Mountain Chief resides. This village is situated in a large bend in the river, on a fine elevation, 100 feet above the present level of the water, and commands a beautiful prospect in this wild and picturesque country. Three other villages are in sight, and the fourth is not a mile distant. There is apparently but little level ground, it being a perfect contrast to all we had seen for seventy miles above Akyub. Here are lofty hills and deep vallies, and all thrown together in the utmost confusion. The hills as well as vallies are covered with tall forest trees, interspersed with bamboos, various kinds of creepers, and occasionally with a coarse grass that grows from ten to twelve feet high.

Reception—Palace of the chief—Domestic arrangement.—From the anxiety which the chief had manifested to have us visit him and his people, we had every reason to expect a kind reception. For the last eight or ten months it had been his constantly expressed wish to have us establish schools among them, and teach them the knowledge of God, but still we had not anticipated so much attention, or rather, so much forethought in reference to our comfort. To our surprize we found a new and well-constructed zayat about fifty feet above the present level of the river, 16 feet by 21, and the ground cleared away so as to make a pleasant walk, and a verandah on one side. But what surprized us most, was, two very neat bamboo bedsteads surrounded with curtains. The chief must have seen a beadstead in our house at Akyab, and so got the idea that this was our manner of sleeping. He returned only four or five days before we left, and during two of these days, there was a very severe storm of wind and rain, which made us wonder how he could possibly have put up such a building. On inquiring of him, he said the whole, from the foundation to the roof, including bedsteads and all, were made in two days. When he saw we had a small folding table and two chairs he felt greatly relieved, for he had felt very sad, he said, to think he could construct no such articles for us. I mention these facts to shew the kind-heartedness of the chief and his people, and their anxiety to make us comfortable. Our zoyat was about fifty yards from the stockade which surrounded the village, and in a delightful situation. After getting every thing arranged in our new home and ready to begin work, we went up into the village and were taken directly to the house of the Mountain Chief (as he is called.) It is certainly no mean specimen of a palace, for though constructed on the same general plan with all the houses of this peculiar people, yet its dimensions and neatness of construction would point it out as the residence of a great man. Like all the houses, the floor is between five and six feet from the ground. After passing across a very large open verandah, we entered, immediately in front, the great hall of audience. It is certainly a fine room, and from the north end we have a most delightful view of the country in all the wildness of its native grandeur. We spent some time in conversation, but most of the time in getting words and sentences expressed in their own language. I left the company at length, and went to take a view of the domestic arrangements. On the left of the great verandah is a very large apartment, and on the right is one of smaller dimensions; these belong to the females and children. His wives—nine in number—were all busily at work, except one. Some were cleaning cotton, some spinning, some weaving and some were cooking; and each one had a child slung on her back, whatever the work might be in which she was engaged. All appeared to be cheerful. It was easy to perceive that the female who was not at work, was a person of no ordinary rank among this people. There was a gracefulness and dignity in her manners which could not fail to impress the most casual observer that she was one of "nature's noble women." Her countenance is intelligent, and her features would indicate a mild and amiable temper. Her face was covered with smiles, so that she appeared to be pleased with herself and pleased with all around her. She was the only one of the females who appeared to have any knowledge of the Burman language, and hers I imagine is very limited, for though she betrayed in her countenance no signs of ignorance, yet she was able to reply to me only in a few half-formed sentences. We were struck with the order and neatness of the apartments. There were no articles lying about the floor, as is always the case in Burmah houses, whatever may be their rank. True, there was no furniture for mere show, and little which we regard as necessary to comfort in civiliz-d life; still they have many articles for the manufacture of cloth, for cooking, for holding water, and for eating, and, though they be of the most primitive kind, they all had their appropriate place. The internal arrangements of the apartments and the furniture, no less than the neat and comfortable manner in which the houses are constructed, as well as the orderly arrangement of the whole village, certainly struck us as indicating, in a more than ordinary degree, an innate sense of neatness and regularity. The posts which support the roof are formed by binding together ten or twelve bamboos, so that at first they might be taken f[illegible]olumns. The roofs of the houses are made [illegible] grass. The walls are double; the [illegible] from the ground to the roof, and the inner from the floor to the roof. The outer wall is formed by placing perfectly straight bamboos, and all of the same size, horizontally one on top of the other, till they reach the top; these are kept together by upright posts at suitable distances. This wall gives the house a very substantial and pretty appearance. The inner wall is made of split bamboos woven into mats. The stairs for going up into their houses are of the same material, and are broad and well formed, while the people of Arracan have only a large pole, with notches cut in it. In fact, every thing pertaining to the houses and villages of the Kemmees indicates an attention to comfort which we have seen among no other class of people in these countries.

Manners and habits of the people—Their language, religion, population, &c—Their clothing is scanty and peculiar. Besides a small turban on the head, the only garment ordinarily worn by the men is a belt about four inches wide, fastened round the hips and between the legs; one end of the belt hanging down before, and one behind. The females have two garments—the upper, a short jacket about ten or twelve inches long, without sleeves and open under one arm; the lower garments is fastened round the hips and reaches half way to the knees. It is remarkable that a people who consult neatness and comfort to so great a degree in the construction of their villages and houses, should have adopted so scanty a covering for their persons. It cannot be for want of material, for they grow a fine, beautiful species of cotton on their hills, and in exchange for cotton procure salt and dried fish from the coast.

The Kemmees have no horses, and though they have a few buffaloes and red cattle, these are not used in tilling the ground or as beasts of burden. Of course the plough is unknown among them—they clear the ground with a dah, (axe), in form much like that used by Burmans, but ground only on one side. With a rude kind of hoe, they plant rice, cotton seed, and several esculents, principally of the gourd king, and tobacco. With the exception of small patches of level ground along the margin of the river and its tributaries, all their cultivation is on the tops and sides of precipitous mountains. Truly they must endure much toil and hardship to procure the necessaries of life. They are, evidently, a hard-working people. If they should receive the Christian religion, and schools become common, they will be prepared to adopt more improved methods of agriculture, and will cultivate gardens. I should think the sweet potato and Indian corn might do well among these hills. However, the eternal well-being of this people is the first and great concern. For some wise purpose God has preserved them from idolatry, and kept alive among them the tradition, that in ancient times the Supreme Being gave to their fathers a Good Book, which through their carelessness was destroyed by a dog, but which in time will be restored, when they will become a wise and happy people. We preached the gospel every evening in the most plain and simple manner, and they listened attentively; but few could understand Burman well enough to receive much instruction. Those who could understand said they believed what we taught, and that all the Kemmees would believe when they came to hear and understand this doctrine. From morning till night we spent nearly all our time in collecting words and sentences so as to learn the structure of the language, but still embraced every opportunity to learn the extent of their country and the probable number of the inhabitants. All we could learn, however, on this last subject was, that for several days journey (200 miles or more,) up the great river, and on all the tributary streams, the inhabitants are Kemmees. The Ko-la-dan, and all its tributaries, are thickly studded with their villages, which vary from ten to fifty families in each. They are certainly a numerous people, and, without doubt, I think, one of the great branches of the Karen family. The Khyiens inhabit all the hill country and the great ranges of the Yuma mountains to the south, as the Kemmees do at the north. After getting about eighty miles north of Ava, I found all the hill country for more than 300 miles, that is, to the Hu Kong valley, inhabited by Ka Khyiens, a people in all respects like the Karens; so that we have Karens, Ka Khyiens, Khyiens and Kemmees, four branches of the same great family, formerly the sole occupants of this vast country, but who have been gradually driven by the Burmans from the valley of the Irawadi and from the sea-coast. On the fourth day after our arrival at the village of the chief, the path of duty appeared to be plain. We accordingly intimated to him, and some of his people, that we should study the language, adopt an alphabet, and as soon as possible give them books in which they could learn the knowledge of God. As might have been expected, they were greatly pleased. In a short time word was brought to us that the chief was going into the neighbouring villages to call together the principal men, and would immediately commence building us a large house. We were obliged to hold him back, or the house would have been begun that very day. We told him we must return home and make arrangements for this work, for it was not a small thing to study their language and get ready to give them books; however, they might expect Mr. Stilson and his family in about twenty days, and that I should, probably, be up again in a month after that. We selected a place for building, and told the chief he might collect the materials at his leisure, that on Mr. Stilson's arrival a house could be put up in a few days. He told Ko Bike that our decision gave him more joy than if he had received thousands of gold and silver, for, said he, "The gold and silver would soon be expended, and neither my children nor my people would be any the better for it; but if we have the knowledge of God, I shall die in peace."

This indicates a degree of intelligence and earnestness which we did not expect to find, and which goes far to encourage us that it is the Lord's work. This village, which we have resolved to make the head-quarters of the Kemmee mission, possesses all the advantages we could desire,—its location is beautiful and healthy,—it is not too far in the interior, and still is far enough to be the centre of a number of villages, embracing, at least, about 3000 inhabitants. It is two degrees north of Akyab, and, therefore, distant on a straight line, 138 miles. There are a few curves in the river, so that the distance, by water, is 150 miles. Mr. Stilson took the latitude of the village, and made it 22° 3' north, which would make it twelve or [illegible] teen miles north of Ava. No foreigner has ever been up the river beyond the boundaries of Arracan, and Burmans are afraid to penetrate; so that the extent of the Kemmee country north, can only be conjectured from the statements of the Kemmees themselves. They speak of two powerful bodies of people far to the north, called Lungkhe, and Tsein-du, who differ somewhat from them in language. I would remark here, that Kemmee is the generic name of this people, though they have a great number of local names. This extraordinary variety of names for one and the same people, originates partly from location and partly from clanship; in some cases, the name of a stream gives a name to the people; and, in other cases, the name of a chief to whose authority they submit. Our intercourse with the Kemmees has been too limited to say much in reference to their national manners and customs,—their vices and their virtues. Polygamy, I should think, does not prevail to any great extent. They have learnt how to make an intoxicating drink from rice, which is used on extraordinary occasions. They regard evil spirits as the principal cause of disease, as also of all other calamities, when they cannot trace them to human agency. This belief in evil demons leads them to offer, on certain occasions, propitiatory sacrifices. They have no religious services, though they believe in a Supreme Being,—in the immortality of the soul, and in future rewards and punishments. Murder, adultery, stealing, and falsehood, are regarded as great crimes, and there is much reason to suppose that these are not their national vices. They are, proverbially, a people of one word.

It is very possible that many might get the impression, from the preceding remarks, that the Kemmees are a harmless, unwarlike people, but such is not the case. Broken up, as they are, into clans under different chiefs, who are supreme among their own people, serious difficulties are rarely, if ever, adjusted in an amicable manner. Feuds are frequent, and often end most disastrously. When one clan nourishes revenge or hatred against another, from whatever cause, an opportunity is sought to fall upon their enemies at a time when least expected. An open declaration of hostile intentions is never made. The triumphant party kill as many men as they can, and all the females and children they can seize are carried away for slaves. Those clans located within the limits of Arracan, are, of course, subject to British rule; and they appear to appreciate the advantages of living in a state of security under the protection of law. Depending for their subsistence almost entirely on the cultivation of the soil, war is not the natural element of the Kemmees; it is rather a circumstance growing out of their peculiar condition.

The introduction of books, and the establishment of schools, will lay the foundation of their civilization and happiness, because the first lessons they learn, will be the knowledge of God. This knowledge will spread over the whole length and breadth of the land, and convert this wilderness into a fruitful field. Mr. Stilson possesses, in an eminent degree, those peculiar qualifications for detecting sounds in all their variety and hardly distinguishable shades of difference, so important in adopting an alphabet. He will adopt the Roman character, which will greatly facilitate all future operations, and render the expense of books much less than if he should adopt an Indian alphabet.—From the Rev. Mr. Kincaid's Journal, in the American Baptist Missionary Magazine, for October, 1842.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. Cobden was indebted for his celebrity in the manufacture of fancy cotton goods to a young man named Whitfield, a native of the city of Dublin, who is deaf and dumb, and who has furnished, these seven years past, those beautiful patterns which brought Mr. Cobden into notice as a manufacturer. Young Whitfield, we have heard, was educated at the Deaf and Dumb Institution at Claremont.—Leinster Express.

Slavery in America.—We copy the following announcement, as disgusting as it is atrocious, from the Vicksburgh Sentinel and Expositor, for the 31st of January last:—"For sale, a lot of about thirty negroes, consisting of men, women, boys, and girls, all raised together, and not bought up for speculation. They may be seen at the ferry landing on the Louisiana side, opposite Vicksburgh. For further information apply at the Glidewell House."—Pat.

The Bench of Bishops.—By the way, it was remarkable that only four of the spiritual lords attended a discussion so deeply interesting to the feelings of the whole religious community (the Somnath proclamation.) We have not heard that there is any high dignitary of the church in articulo mortis.—Chronicle.

Mr. Pemberton, whose practice in the Rolls Court had already considerably enriched him, has recently obtained an accession to his property of nearly [illegible]000*l.* a-year. He has, therefore, urged his claims, [illegible] that he can support the dignity, upon the Tory Government for a peerage. It is likely that he will be nominated Deputy Speaker of the House of Lords.—Pat.

Municipal Politeness.—Baron Lefroy arrived in Kilkenny on Saturday, and at once proceeded to open the commission in the city. He said he had to express his regret at the want of respect and courtesy shown to him as the bearer of her Majesty's commission. He was not attended by any of the authorities who were bound to attend him, and was left to grope his way, at the discretion of his post-boys, through the city of Kilkenny, to his lodging. He should express his dissatisfaction at the conduct of the Sheriffs of the City, and fine them 50*l.* On entering the County Court, the Baron made similar observations upon the County Sheriff, and fined him 50*l.*—Limerick Chronicle.

Murder of Dr. Martin, at Malta.—A most melancholy occurrence took place at Valetta, March 6, in the murder, without any cause being assigned for it, of the Chief Surgeon of the Malta Naval Hospital, Dr. Martin. He was shot dead by a sentry of the 88th Regiment, on duty at the Victualling-office, as he was stepping out of the door of Rear-Admiral Sir John Louis, where he had been on a professional visit.—Pat.

Authors.—On Saturday week, a very numerous party of authors assembled at the British Hotel in Cockspur-street, and formed themselves into a body, for the mutual protection of their interests, and for obtaining for themselves something of a higher status than has been hitherto granted to mere "men of letters" in this country.—Ibid.

Will of Lord Hill.—The will of the Right Hon. Viscount Rowland Lord Hill, G. C. B., G. H., P. C., General and Commander of the Forces, Colonel of the Horse Guards (Blue), has just been proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. The effects have been sworn under 30,000*l.* His lordship bequeaths to eleven of his nephews as follows:—To the Rev. John Hill, 1,300*l.*; Richard Frederick Hill, 1,300*l.*; Philip Hill, 1,300*l.*; Clement Delves Hill, 1,000*l.*; George Staveley Hill, 1,300*l*; Alfred Edward Hill, 1,300*l.*; Percy Hill, 1,300*l.*; Francis Hill, 1,300*l.*; Arthur Hill, 1,300*l.*; Horace Hill, 1,300*l.* (and an annuity of 100*l.* per annum for life); and Charles Hill, 1,300*l.* To his sisters, Mary Hill and Emma Hill, an annuity of 50*l.* To his butler he gives (should he be in his service at the time of his lordship's death), 100*l.* To his valet (upon the same condition), 50*l.* To his friend, Archibald Flair, Esq., M. D., 100*l.*, as a trifling token of his esteem. The following curious legacies are also bequeathed:—5 guineas per annum to the person who has charge of the column at Shrewsbury; 10 guineas per annum for the purpose of lighting the top of the column at night; and 10 guineas per annum to the person who has charge of such light. The executors named in the will are his lordship's nephews, John Hill and George Staveley Hill, and his friend Richard Egerton, Esq. The last-named gentleman is left a legacy of 2,000*l.*—Britannia.

Death of the Duke of Manchester.—We have to announce the demise of the Duke of Manchester, a courier having arrived on Wednesday afternoon from Rome with the mournful intelligence. The Noble Duke expired on the morning of the 18th inst., at Rome, Mr. and Lady Georgiana Baillie, and several members of his family, being with his Grace at his dissolution. For some considerable time past the Noble Duke had resorted to Nice, Naples, Florence, &c., for the benefit of his health, and has for the last three years been obliged to repair to Italy for the winter, in order to have the advantage of a milder climate. The deceased William Montagu, Duke and Earl of Manchester, Viscount Mandeville, and Baron Montagu of Kimbolton, in the peerage of Great Britain, was second son of George, fourth Duke, by Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the late Sir James Dashwood. He was born on the 21st of October, 1768, succeeded to the title on the death of his father, on the 2d of September, 1788. In October, 1793, he married Lady Susan Gordon, third daughter of Alexander, fourth Duke of Gordon, and sister of the gallant Duke, by whom, who died on the 26th of August, 1828, he leaves issue—Lady Elizabeth, born on the 11th of December, 1795, and married, on the 10th of August, 1819, Colonel Thomas Steel; Lady Susan, born September 18, 1797, married to the Marquis of Tweeddale, Governor of Madras; George Viscount Mandeville; Lady Georgiana, born March 16, 1803, and married, October 11, 1823, Mr. Evan Baillie; and Lady Caroline Catharine, born September 27, 1804, and married, February 13, 1828, Mr. John Hales Calcraft, M. P. The late Duke was for some years Governor of Jamaica, and Postmaster-General. He was Lord-Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Huntingdonshire for many years, but resigned, in consequence of his indifferent health, last year, when the Earl of Sandwich was appointed his successor. By his death a pension of 2,928*l.* reverts to the Crown, which he enjoyed on the abolishment of the office of Collector of the Customs. The deceased is succeeded in the family honours and estates by his eldest son, Viscount Mandeville, beforementioned. He was born July 9, 1799, and married Miss Sparrow, only daughter and heiress of the late General Robert Bernard Sparrow, by Lady Olivia Acheson, by whom he had three sons and a daughter—namely, Lord Kimbolton, born October 15, 1823; the Hon. Robert, the Hon. Frederick, and the Hon. Olivia. The present Duke, whose zealous support to the different religious and charitable institutions is well known, represented Huntingdonshire in the House of Commons in five Parliaments, from 1826 till 1837. The deceased Duke was a stanch Conservative in politics, but took little or no part in public affairs for many years past.—Morning Paper.

Factory Education Bill.—On Thursday a Special Meeting of the General Committee of the Catholic Institute of Great Britain, was held at the rooms of the Society in Soho-square, for the purpose of drawing up Resolutions and a Petition against the educational clauses of the Factory Bill. Among those present were Lord Stourton, the Hon. E. Petre, the Hon. W. Petre, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Huddleston, the Rev. H. Lee, Secretary to the Roman Catholic Bishop of London, the Rev. J. Moore, &c. Lord Stourton presided, and Resolutions to oppose the Bill in every stage were unanimously adopted.—Record.

Mr. Macaulay's Speech on the Gates, Hindooism, &c.—When our empire first arose in that dominion, we found there 100,000,000 of subjects. Of these a very large part were Mussulmen, who formed a minority it was true, but a minority which was to be reckoned by tens of millions—a minority more forward than the majority in knowledge and power, of higher intelligence, a bolder spirit, and more accustomed to war. (Hear, hear.) Mingled with these were millions of idolaters, whom it was our duty, if not influenced thereto by higher motives, even with a view to the temporal interests of mankind, to endeavour to exalt to a higher standard. (Hear, hear.) The wild fables to which these people gave implicit credence, nay, their very belief itself had in it the elements of degradation. (Hear, hear.) Their faith was at variance with, and countenanced grave errors in, physical knowledge, raising great and almost insuperable obstacles against the advance of science. (Hear, hear.) The rites of their religion were in themselves fatal to morality, and their symbols, signs, and badges were such as could not possibly be named. (Hear, hear.) From their form of worship the very worst forms of prostitution arose. The whole series of their forms tended to the utter degradation of the female race, and all sorts of crime increased in proportion (Hear, hear.) Who could contemplate the horrors of the Suttee, or who could forget that Thuggism, directly instigated robbery and murder, as sanctioned by its horrid divinity? When in the East, he (Mr. Macaulay) had heard of two Thugs, one of whom, when conversing with another, having ascertained that the latter, after robbing a traveller, allowed him to depart with a small portion of his property on his person, exclaimed, "How can you expect that your god will bless you, if you thus suffer a traveller to escape?" (Hear, hear.) In a country where religions of this sort prevailed, one of the greatest problems which the governing power had to solve, was how to deal with the people, so as to bring them to a sense of their error. We might have attempted large schemes of proselyteism, but they never had been attempted. The Government had most wisely uniformly followed the plan of not attempting to make proselytes. We might have imposed civil disabilities, but we had not done so; and the last Charter Act of 1803 contained a distinct declaration that no native should be incapable of holding any situation under the Government, whatever his religion. These things we had not done, and therein had acted most wisely. He was not sure that there was not for some time a dangerous and pernicious leaning the other way. He was inclined to think there was, and that the idolatrous practices of the natives had been made a means of bringing in revenue. (Hear, hear.) We had long looked with exceeding great jealousy upon the missionaries who settled in India, and had treated them with a severity which their conduct never in the slightest degree deserved. We had tolerated long human sacrifices and the practice of the suttee, which he conceived we might have put down without the slightest departure from the principle of toleration because he had ever held that no principle of toleration should induce us to traffic in the lives of our fellow-creatures. (Hear, hear.) We even assisted in idolatrous practices by sending our troops to escort the natives to their places of religious resort, which they looked upon as kind marks in favour of their religion. To this he strongly objected. He thought it was undignified and inexpedient, if that were all, but it was clear that the effect had been to lead the people of India to believe that we attached no importance whatever to the vast distinction—he was not going into the theology of the subject: he should confine himself to topics relating to the temporal happiness of mankind—to the vast distinction between that religion which had everywhere been the firmest ally of civilization, social order, and human happiness, which had broken the chains of the slave, and mitigated the horrors of war; and this idolatrous, most obscene, and malignant religion, which it was our duty to tolerate, but which we could not encourage without committing an act of treason against civilization and humanity. (Cheers.) Gradually a purer system was introduced, and without meaning to say it amounted to absolute protection, he was not aware that at the present moment the rules laid down by the Home Government for the conduct of our Indian authorities did admit of any considerable improvement. Lord Wellesley he believed it was who had led the way. He it was who had abolished the immolation of female children; and numerous as were the titles of that eminent man to the gratitude of his country, he (Mr. Macaulay) held that there were none which his friends and the country would recollect with more pleasure than that. (Hear.) In 1830 the restrictions on missionaries were relaxed. Soon after the suttee was abolished by Lord W. Bentinck, and orders were sent out to him from the Government to abolish also the pilgrim-tax. In February, 1833, Lord Glenelg wrote that most important, and valuable despatch, to which such frequent reference had subsequently been made. In paragraph 62 of that despatch would be found a complete system, he might call it, of legislation, a regular code for the conduct of the English authorities in India, on this subject. One of the articles stated that all matters whatever relating to the temples of the idolators, should be left entirely to the natives themselves. (Hear, hear.) This despatch was of course to be acted on by the British authorities in India with some degree of discretion. It could not be expected that such a change could be at once and suddenly made throughout the empire. A discretion was left to the authorities, and they certainly had exercised it; for in one part of India they had shown themselves over cautious. In 1838 came another despatch, in which distinct reference was made to the former despatch, in which the progress of the results of that despatch were distinctly pointed out, and in which the authorities were desired to carry it into speedy effect. In 1841 orders were sent out which he must say were so framed that he could almost believe Lord Ellenborough had carefully read them through for the purpose of disobeying every one of them in succession. (Laughter.) Amongst them were distinct orders to have nothing to do with the native temples—(hear, hear)—to send no presents to the native temples—(hear, hear)—to have nothing to do with the putting up of decorations in the native temples—(hear, hear)—and positive and explicit orders to employ no troops in doing honour to native temples. (Cheers.) While that despatch of 1841 was being acted on, our relations to the idolaters of India did, he believed, stand in the best position they could. To attempt to convert them by force would be an execrable crime; and for the object of converting them by reason and instruction, he believed that individuals were better qualified than the Government. (Hear, hear.) Therefore did we oppose in the strongest manner any departure from the system of neutrality. And now he came to the charge against Lord Ellenborough, which was, that he had departed from that neutrality—(cheers)—that he had disobeyed the orders of those from whom his power was derived, and to whom his obedience was due. That was the first and the most obvious, but not the gravest charge. Was it possible to deny that the noble lord had sent decorations to an idol temple, that he had interfered with the concerns of idol temples, and that he had made a gift to an idol temple? (Hear, hear.) But did the hon. member seriously deny that to send out troops for the purpose of conveying the trophy of a Mahometan mosque to a Hindoo temple for the purpose of placing it—he would use his lordship's own words—in "the restored temple of Somnauth"—(cheers)—was contrary to the orders which his lordship had received? He was sure the hon. member would not attempt to deny it. What were they to understand by the word "restored?" The temple was in ruins—(hear)—and was it possible for the house to doubt that before Lord Ellenborough determined upon such an important proceeding, he had taken the trouble to ascertain in what state the temple of Somnauth was? If the hon. gentleman were to say that Lord Ellenborough wrote that despatch without asking in what condition the temple of Somnauth was, then would he pronounce upon his lordship one of the severest censures. But it was clear that Lord Ellenborough had asked in what state the temple was. It was clear that he had been informed that it was in ruins; "and then," said his lordship, "we will replace and restore it." Could it be said that the restoration of the temple was not to be the preliminary step to the setting up of the gates? (Hear.) Lord Ellenborough said, "In that restored temple we will place the gates." (Hear.) He defied all human ingenuity to get rid of that dilemma. It was impossible to clear away this "homage to idols." Twist it as you might, and it would still be like the stain upon the key in the story of Blue Beard. (Laughter.) Again, he was not only ordered to pay homage to no Indian religion, but to offer insult to none; yet he had offered insult to one of those religions—to Mahometanism, which had the merit, common to it, with Judaism and Christianity itself, of abhorring polytheism. Mr. Tennent had triumphed in the discovery that the temple to which the gates belonged was that of Siva; but Siva was, in Indian mythology, the "destroyer." The two most serious dangers which the British Government in India had known were caused by religious interference with the Mahometans; at Vellore, in the affair of the turbans; and at Bangalore, in the affair of the mosque. Now, did Ministers mean to let their Governor General act upon his own proclamation? Was he to govern upon Brahminical principles, and restore the temple with its dancing girls? No doubt they would take care to countermand him; but was it no evil thus to make announcements and abandon them, to be always doing and undoing? Other Governors General might have been hated; but now, for the first time, a Governor General was laughed at. Turgid passages from Eastern compositions had been cited; but ought their style to be imitated by a British Governor General? Ought he, because the native princes deck their horses with beads and have black faces, to ride out upon a palfrey so adorned, and paint his own face black? The Indians, whatever their own dress, habits, and style, yet perfectly understood and respected the sobriety of the English in all these particulars. The proclamation, however, in truth, was imitated, not from Indian compositions, but from the trashy manifestoes of the French revolutionary generals, who loved to talk nonsense about ancient Rome. He was sure such a document had not been sanctioned by any of the civil servants, by any of those who understood the country and the people; but, indeed, Lord Ellenborough kept those civil servants at such a distance that none of them ever ventured to offer their advice. Really the vast power of an Indian Governor General was not to be trusted to a man who was thus wanting in discretion of his own, and thus unwilling to profit by the discretion of others. If the East India Directors thought they ought not to recall him, at least let them order him to go back to Calcutta, where his council was resident; he would then be obliged to hear advice, though he would not be compelled to follow it.—Pat.

THE WEEKLY MEETINGS OF THE LEAGUE having become too large to be contained in the Hall of the Crown and Anchor, even with the additions of the large committee room, and the wide lobby and staircase, each accommodating a separate audience, Drury-Lane Theatre has been engaged for one night a week during the period of Lent.—Ibid.

EARTHQUAKES IN ENGLAND.—It is exactly 800 years since the first earthquake is recorded to have taken place in this country, it having happened at Worcester and Derby in 1043. Four similar visitations are stated to have fallen on England during the following half century. An earthquake that was generally felt throughout the country occurred in 1090, and was followed by a scarcity of food. In 1199, the county of Somerset suffered from a like cause; and St. Michael's-on-the-Hill, without Glastonbury, was thrown down by shocks that were also felt throughout the country in 1247. Earthquakes were experienced in England during each of the three succeeding years—a remarkable succession of such evils! The greatest earthquake ever known in this country occurred in 1318, and in April, 1580, another caused great damage in various directions. It lasted only one minute, but the shock was so severe that many churches and houses were much shattered, and many lives were lost. According to the quaint phraseology of Stow, "The great clocke-bell in the Palace at Westminster stroke of itself against the hammer with shaking, as divers clockes and belles in the city and elsewhere did the like." This earthquake extended into many parts of England; and in Kent there were three distinct shocks, that caused much damage. In 1583 one occurred in the county of Dorset, that "removed a considerable piece of ground." Earthquakes were felt at London and several other places in Britain in March, 1749, and in 1750, and gave rise to the publication by Dr. Stukeley, in which he attributed the phenomena not to vapours or fermentations generated in the bowels of the earth, but to electricity. On one of these occasions, it is stated that "a sound was observed to roll from the Thames to Temple-bar, just as the electrical snap precedes the shock." In 1750, the same counties now visited suffered from an earthquake that caused much damage in Liverpool, Chester, Manchester, &c.; and in the beginning of 1761 great alarm was excited throughout the metropolis and its neighbourhood by two shocks, on February 8 and March 8. In 1786 earthquakes occurred in different parts of the north of England: in Westmoreland in 1790; in the counties of Bedford, Leicester, Lincoln, Nottingham, &c., in March, 1792; at Shaftesbury and Salisbury in September, 1793, &c. The above are but a few of the earthquakes that are recorded to have visited England.—Pat.

THE COLUMBIA sailed from Liverpool on Saturday for Halifax and Boston. She carried about 50 passengers, among whom was Sir Charles Metcalfe, the new Governor-General of Canada, and suite. The Acadia, which sailed on the 4th ult., had been spoken at sea; she had then, though not six days out from Liverpool, completed above half her passage across the Atlantic.—Pat. 6th March.

TRADE WITH PORTUGAL.—The Times has discovered a most extraordinary source of obstruction in Portugal to a commercial treaty with England:—"We understand, upon good authority, that a very influential member of the Cabinet of Lisbon is engaged in a speculation for having low woollen cloths manufactured at Paisley with Portuguese marks, in order to be smuggled into Portugal. Thus that illustrious personage hopes to accomplish at the same time a twofold purpose, by securing to himself the advantages of a foreign trade which he denies to his country, and by making it appear that Portugal really has valuable manufactures, which justify the Government in demanding further concessions of the British Minister."—Ibid.

FRANCE.—The National estimates the profits realised by Government from the monopoly of the tobacco and snuff manufacture, between July 1, 1811, and Dec. 31, 1842, at 1,488,123,634f., (nearly 60,000,000*l.*), independent of the loss sustained during the invasion.

The new law or tax on patents in France is worthy of attention, it being the income-tax on commercial and professional earnings in that country. By the old law, drawn up in Napoleon's reign, commercial persons were divided into seven classes, the five first paying, besides a certain fixed duty, 10 per cent. upon their rent. But house-rent has so much increased in France, that the sum paid was far under 10 per cent. The new law divides the patentees into eight classes, which pay a fifteenth, a twentieth or a thirtieth, of their rent. Professional men, such as lawyers, physicians, as well as notaries and attorneys, are subjected to the new patent law.—Ibid.

SERVIA.—The Chronicle, upon the authority of its correspondent at Constantinople, gives the substance of the Porte's reply to the demand made by Russia for the revocation of the act of Sovereignty of Alexander Georgewicz in Servia—a reply notifying the determination of the Porte not to abandon the new dynasty, and to maintain the constitutional rights of its Servian subjects.—Ibid.

SERVIA.—The Levant mail has just brought us Malta letters of the 7th inst., and Constantinople ones of the 22nd ult. The chief contents are the discovery of a conspiracy at Belgrade to displace Prince Michel, which has been traced to the Princess Lubitzka, mother of Prince Michel, and Russian agents. Of course, every stir in Servia, at the present moment, will be attributed to Russia, though, perhaps, not wrongfully. The Princess Lubitzka was a devotee, and had much influence over the Servian clergy. The Servian Government will, in consequence, be removed from Belgrade up the country to Krajugewitz. Previous to this plot, Wutschitz and the Servian Ministers had published an amnesty.—Ibid.

PRUSSIA.—Two measures of the Prussian Government have attracted attention. One was the refusal of Prussia to take advantage of the commercial facilities and advantages offered to it by Russia, unless they were extended to the entire German union. This Russia declined.

The other measure is the edict on the censorship. This edict is chiefly directed against anti-religious works. The censors are to forbid all works, "the tendency of which is in opposition to the fundamental principles of religion in general, and the Christian faith in particular." Also, such works as, "although destined for a limited number of readers, or for savans, contain indiscreet and odious attacks on religion, foreign to the calm and moderate character of received opinions. Accordingly, anything tending to offence, or render ridiculous one of the Christian churches." Also, such "fanatical works as seek to introduce into the domain of politics, truths appertaining exclusively to religion, in order to produce thereby confusion of ideas."

This edict, to prevent the introduction of "works tending to create confusion of ideas," comes rather late in Germany, where, certainly, (remarks the Chronicle,) the most beautiful confusion of ideas that can be well imagined reigns on all serious subjects. As to irreligion, the work is done. Strauss and his followers have published volume upon volume. Full liberty was given for attacking Christianity, and the result was, that this liberty was carried to such excess and absurdity, that it brought with it its own remedy, and the few minds that had been led astray, have already returned in disgust to their former opinions. Strauss himself had recoiled from the "sound himself had made;" and German learning and good sense would have completed a victory that the censorship can now only interrupt.

In politics, the censors must forbid any works "developing theories tending to shake the constitution of the monarchy, or any constitution in existence in the German states, &c." Austria enjoys a despotic constitution, consequently, the Prussians must not write against despotism! We fear the edict regulating the censorship will give rise to loud complaints. It were far better to have said nothing.—Pat.

FOLLIES OF THE GREAT.—The German journals are full of descriptions of the great Court balls at Munich and Berlin. At Berlin, Alphonso of Ferrara was supposed to give the fête, which commenced by a series of tableaux, represented by living personages. At Munich, a game of chess was played, the courtiers acting as men. Pawns, knights, bishops, &c., then danced a quadrille.—Ibid.

LEGISLATIVE REFORM AT ROME.—Advices from Rome mention that the Pontifical Government had abolished, to a certain extent, the exorbitant privilege which hitherto ensured impunity to malefactors who sought an asylum in the churches and convents of the Pope's dominions. A recent legislative enactment provides, that hereafter the secular authorities may cause to be followed and arrested, wherever they may take refuge, all individuals guilty; first, of the destruction of relics, or images of the saints; second, of profanation of the churches; third, of insults by words or violence against clergymen dressed in their costumes; fourth, of high treason; fifth, of murder; sixth, of highway robbery, either singly or with the aid of accomplices; and, seventh, of coining.—Record.

TRIAL OF M'KENZIE.—The proceedings before the court martial in the case of Commander M'Kenzie are suspended for a few days, in consequence of his indisposition. While the United States' District Court was in session, Judge Betts presiding, the grand jury appealed to the Court for its opinion on the question—Can the grand jury legally take up the case of M'Kenzie while he is on trial before the court martial? or can the jury, after his case has been decided by the court martial, commence proceedings against him de novo? This subject is now undergoing a thorough examination before Judge Betts. Able counsel are employed for and against M'Kenzie.—Ibid.

65th Regt. N. I.—Lieut. C. T. E. Hinde, doing duty with the Arracan local battalion, from 18th April to 15th June, to visit the presidency, preparatory to applying for furlough to Europe, on medical certificate.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 19th May, 1843.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, with the concurrence of the Right Honourable the Governor General of India, is pleased to authorize officers commanding corps of native infantry to re-commence the enlistment of recruits, to complete their respective regiments to the present prescribed establishment.

The following orders are confirmed:

The Saugor division order of the 5th instant, directing Assistant Surgeon J. Barber, of the 40th regiment of native infantry, to afford medical aid to the Civil Establishments at Saugor and Damoh, on the departure of Surgeon C. Mottley, with the 3d native infantry, towards Hussingabad.

The presidency division order of the 6th instant, directing Assistant Surgeon G. B. Seely, doing duty under the orders of the Superintending Surgeon at Barrackpore, to join and do duty in the hospital of the left wing of the 3d battalion of artillery and infantry recruits at Dum-Dum.

The Cawnpore division order of the 10th instant, directing Assistant Apothecary E. Enser to act as Steward with the 3d brigade of horse artillery, and appointing acting Apothecary A. Creswick to the hospital of Her Majesty's 50th regiment of foot.

The Cawnpore division order of the 11th instant, directing Assistant Surgeon J. Sutherland, doing duty with the 4th battalion of artillery, to proceed to Humeerpore, and perform the Civil Medical duties at that station, during the absence of Assistant surgeon Sill.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is pleased to direct the following removals and postings:

Col. (Major General) Ezekiel Barton, from the 71st to the 40th regiment of native infantry.

Col. Alexander Dick (new promotion) to the 71st regiment of native infantry.

Lieutenant Colonel John Ralph Ouseley, (new promotion) on staff employ, to the 42d regiment of native infantry.

Lieut. Col. George Hulsh, (new promotion) on furlough, to the 71st regiment of native infantry.

Sergeant John Charlton, Assistant Overseer in the Benares division of public works, is, at his own request, remanded to the regiment of artillery, and directed to join the 1st company of the 3d battalion at Agra, in the rank he held previous to his transfer to the Town Major's list.

Sergeant Major Michael Rohan, at present doing duty with the 1st regiment of native infantry, is, at his own request, remanded to the regiment of artillery, and directed to join the 4th company of the 3d battalion at Dum-Dum, in the rank he held previous to his transfer to the Town Major's list.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

5th Regt. N. I.—Lieut. Col. H. Burney, from 14th April to 14th November, to remain at Sylhet, on medical certificate.

9th Regt. N. I.—Major G. A. Smith, from 25th April to 4th May, in extension, to enable him to rejoin his regiment at Sukkur.

Subordinate Medical Department.—Hospital Steward

G. Dalby, from 1st June to 1st Dec., to visit Benares, on private affairs.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 22d May, 1843.

The following orders, issued by Col. S. Bolton, C. B. commanding at Umballah, are confirmed:

Dated 8th March, 1843.—Appointing Assistant Apothecary C. Hurley, of Her Majesty's 31st foot, to act as Steward in the hospital of that corps, during the absence, on leave, of hospital Steward R. Cumming.

Dated 26th April, 1843.—Directing Assistant Surgeon C. H. James, of Her Majesty's 31st foot, to afford medical aid to the 3d irregular cavalry, on the departure of Assistant Surgeon M. Lovell, on leave, on medical certificate.

Dated 7th May, 1843.—Directing Assistant Surgeon G. Rae, of the 3d irregular cavalry, to afford medical aid to the detachment of the 15th regiment of native infantry on duty at Umballah, and also to the Executive Engineer and barrack department at the station.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is pleased to direct the following postings of medical officers:

Assistant Surgeon D. Woodburn, M. D. recently returned from furlough, to the 46th regiment of native infantry at Barrackpore.

Assistant Surgeon J. B. Macdonald, recently returned from furlough, to the 1st regiment of native infantry at Barrackpore.

Assistant Surgeon T. A. Wethered to the 21st regiment of native infantry at Berhampore.

The services of Sergeant W. Craig, of the corps of sappers and miners, Gunner A. Creswick, of the 1st battalion of artillery, and Mr. G. Simmonds, who were appointed temporarily to the subordinate medical department, in the presidency division order of the 29th Nov. last, being no longer required, the two former are remanded to regimental duty, and the latter is to be paid up and discharged. from the date on which this order may be published at Cawnpore.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

49th Regt. N. I.—Major J. F. Douglas, from 1st May to 1st November, to remain at Dinapore, on medical certificate.

This cancels the remaining portion of the leave granted to him in General Orders of the 9th of March last.

16th Regiment Grenadiers.—Captain C. G. Macan, from 1st June to 1st December, to visit Mussoorie, on private affairs.

By order of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief,

J. R. LUMLEY, Major General,
Adjutant General of the Army.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 28th May, 1843.

No. 31.—1. His grace the Commander-in-Chief having caused a notification to be made, that the Queen has been pleased to approve of Lieut. General Sir Hugh Gough, Bart. and G. C. B., being appointed Commander-in-Chief of all Her Majesty's forces serving in the East Indies, with the local rank of General; the same is accordingly announced to Her Majesty's corps in this command.

2. All returns, reports and applications are however to be directed, as hitherto, until further orders.

3. The Commander-in-Chief in India is pleased to make the following promotion, until Her Majesty's pleasure shall be known:

63d Foot.—Lieut. and Adjutant William James Darling, to be Captain, without purchase, vice Pratt, deceased. 20th April 1843.

4 The following orders are confirmed:

By His Excellency Lieut. General Sir T. McMahon, Bart. K. C. B., granting leave of absence to Lieut. Coote and Ensign Pennefather, 22d foot, to England, for 2 years respectively, from the date of embarkation, at the recommendation of a Board of Medical Officers.

By His Excellency Lieut. General the Most Noble the Marquis of Tweeddale, K. T., granting leave of absence to Ensign Masterson, 63d foot, to England, for 2 years from the date of embarkation, at the recommendation of a Board of Medical Officers.

By Major General the Right Honourable Lord Saltoun, K. C. B. and G. C. H., dated the 20th January and 10th March, 1843, granting leave of absence to the following officers:

98th Regt.—Captain Russell, to Singapore, for 6 months from the date of embarkation, and Lieut. Colby, to Bombay, from the 1st March to the 30th July 1843 to await the result of their applications to return from the service, by the sale of their commissions.

By Major General Sir George Pollock, G. C. B., commanding the Dinapore division, dated the 4th instant, granting leave of absence to Assistant Surgeon Banon, 62d regiment, to Calcutta, from the 5th May to the 4th July 1843, for the purpose of appearing before a Board of Medical Officers.

5. The leave of absence granted to Capt. Peacocke, 25th Foot, in the General Order of the 28th January 1843, is cancelled at his own request.

6. Leave of absence—

9th Lancers.—Captain Rose, prolonged from the 11th June to the 20th September 1843, to remain at Simlah.

The leave of absence granted to this officer in the General Order of the 10th March 1843, is to commence from the 26th instead of the 10th March 1843.

3d Buffs.—Major General Dennis, from the 18th May to the 1st Nov. 1843, to remain at Mussoorie, on medical certificate.

This cancels the unexpired portion of the leave of absence granted this officer in the General Order of the 1st April 1843; viz. from the 18th May to the 15th October.

21st Fusiliers.—Major General Walker prolonged from the 1st June to the 31st Oct. 1843, to enable him to proceed to Madras.

26th Cameronians.—Captain Young, prolonged from the 6th June 1843, to remain at Fort William, until the result of his application to exchange into the 39th regiment be made known.

40th Foot.—Lieut. White, for 3 months from the 12th May 1843, to Calcutta, for the purpose of appearing before a Board of Medical Officers.

40th Foot.—Lieut. Olpherts, to Calcutta, for 4 months from the 1st June 1843, and thence to England, for 2 years from the date of embarkation.

44th Foot.—Capt. Souter, prolonged from the 24th May to the 23d July, to remain at Mussoorie.

By Order of his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief,

H. G. SMITH, Major General,
Adjutant General H. M. Forces in India.

OVERLAND MAIL.

THE Bombay Government intends to despatch the Suez Mail Steamers of the following months, on the dates specified below, viz.

The Steamer for August on the 18th July.

" Sept. on the 25th Aug.

With reference to the above, notice is hereby given, that the latest safe date for the transmission of letters from Calcutta, which may be intended for the Steamer appointed to leave Bombay on the 18th July, will be Wednesday, the 5th proximo.

WM. MOORE,

Fort William, General Post Office,
The 10th June, 1843.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

From R. Trotter, Esq. Co's. Rs. 20, to the Benevolent Institution, Calcutta.

OUR OWN STEAMER.—Seldom has the community in Calcutta been more agreeably surprised than it was on Wednesday last by the unexpected arrival of the Mail, which was not expected by the most sanguine to reach us before Tuesday, the 20th. It arrived in Calcutta about 4 P. M. on the 14th, and as it left London at 6 P. M. on the 6th, it was just thirty-nine days and two hours on the route. We need scarcely observe that this is the quickest journey ever made from London. Finding the Bombay express had thus forestalled our own Steamer, the arrival of which was not calculated on before Monday, the 19th, we had resigned ourselves in despair to the taunts which we knew the Bombay Press would not fail to pour on us, when they found the anticipations in which we had indulged on the first voyage of the Hindoostan from Suez, so completely nullified. But to the astonishment of all, the Steamer itself was announced the very next day, having made the run from Suez, including stoppages, in 23 days and 17 hours; and, excluding stoppages, in nineteen days and a half. Thus the Steamer has trod on the heels of the most rapid express ever received in Calcutta. If she had not been detained four days and six hours by the wretched arrangements for coaling; if she had been employed only two days in receiving coal, she would have brought the London Mail to Calcutta in thirty-eight days and a quarter. When therefore the arrangements at Ceylon and Aden are completed, and the Peninsular Company is enabled to ship coals as quickly as the Honourable Company, the Calcutta and Suez Steamers may always be expected to bring our letters and packets as rapidly as the Bombay Express when most speedy, and frequently to anticipate the express itself, even at the most favourable season of the year. The Bombay folks will naturally ask, what advantage we shall derive from having our London papers of the Mail day brought by sea instead of by land, when the difference, as now established by experience, cannot be more than twenty-four hours either way? The advantage is in every respect great. Among the minor but not less gratifying results of this steam communication with our own doors, will be the early and complete receipt of our letters and papers. We may mention that at the date of this writing, Tuesday evening, we have not received more than five of the April Newspapers, out of thirty which we expect from Bombay, and this after the express had been in six days. All our May periodical publications, which were sent by the Hindoostan, have already been in our possession twenty-four hours. To the inhabitants of the metropolis the convenience of receiving all their letters and packages at once, and at a reasonable rate, is such as those only can appreciate who have been subject to the misery of having them delivered, day after day, in mortifying driblets at an irritating price. It is scarcely matter of surprize that we should not obtain the sympathy of our worthy fellow citizens of Bombay, for they have never experienced our miseries.

We are sorry to find Capt. Moresby styling the voyage from Suez to Calcutta, the homeward bound voyage of the vessel. It is in very bad taste. The word home is sacredly associated in the mind of an Englishman with England. Whenever he is obliged to allude to any other place by that endearing name, it is done with a manifest conviction that nothing but the necessity of circumstances could justify such a misuse of the word. It is a poor complement to the European community in Calcutta to desecrate the word, by applying it, even in the case of a steamer, to any city in India.

THE MAY MAIL which came in on Wednesday, is as usual pronounced to be newsless. Yet it announces the death of one member of the Royal family and the birth of another. The Duke of Sussex, the most popular of all the sons of George the Third, has at length paid the debt of nature at the age of seventy; and at his own particular request has been buried far from his royal ancestors, in the cemetry of Kensal Green. Her Majesty has been happily delivered of a third child, a daughter; and though the same interest has not been felt on this occasion which was felt on the birth of the first born, or of the Prince of Wales, yet the universal and affectionate esteem in which her Majesty is held by all her subjects,—a few revolutionary Chartists excepted—has created a national feeling of delight at this addition to her domestic happiness. Her Majesty was rapidly recovering; and it was expected that the visit of the Court to the Emerald Isle would not be delayed.

In the obituary of the present month, we regret to find the two honoured names of Lady William Bentinck and Thomas Clarkson. Lady William died at Paris after a protracted illness. Long will her memory continue to be cherished in this country for her affability, her unaffected piety, and her boundless liberality. She has left claims upon our grateful remembrance, independent of the association of her name with that of her illustrious husband; for she had a character of her own, and it was eminently distinguished by those virtues which serve to adorn human nature. Thomas Clarkson, has earned for himself an honourable place among those who have disinterestedly devoted their lives to the service of their fellow men. His name is indissolubly associated with the abolition of the slave trade, to the success of which no man contributed more effectually, if perhaps we except Mr. Wilberforce. It was through his untiring exertions that the evidence of its enormities which first made so deep impression on the public mind at home, was collected and arranged. It was Clarkson who travelled from town to town in the cause of humanity, at a time when it was regarded generally with feelings of profound apathy. It was he who raised up advocates in all parts of the country, engaged Editors of provincial newspapers to rouse public attention to the iniquity of the trade, and gave that impulse to the public mind, which in sixteen years secured its abolition.

The occupation of the Marquesas and Tahiti, has given a new direction to the national enthusiasm in France, and the country is ringing with projects for colonization, which must eventually prove abortive. The French Ministry had determined to ask the Chambers for 240,000*l.* for the erection of fortresses in the newly acquired islands of the Pacific, where French domination is to be rendered complete. These distant and useless possessions will only serve to drain France of men and money without contributing in the smallest degree to the increase of her foreign commerce. It does not appear that the British Ministry has lifted up its voice against the fraudulent and unjustifiable occupation of Tahiti. In fact, it is tongue-tied by Lord Ellenborough. With what color of decency can we remonstrate with France against the acquisition of a petty island or two, while we are taking possession of countries, fertile as Egypt, and annexing them without scruple to our magnificent empire in the East?

The subject of Slavery in India has been brought under the notice of Parliament by Mr. Stuart Wortley in an allusion to a report of two American Naval Commanders to Congress, in which they stated that "Bombay and perhaps other British possessions in the East Indies were among the greatest markets of slaves." Sir Robert Peel offered an elaborate explanation, which was remarkable chiefly for its omission of all reference to the fact that the slave trade in India had long been illegal, and that by a law passed in the present year, slavery itself had been abolished throughout the British possessions. It would be strange indeed if this great act, by which the year 1843 will hereafter be characterized, should have been unknown to the Prime Minister; and stranger still, if, when in possession of the fact, he neglected to bring it forward, and to offer it as a final and satisfactory reply to all the imputations cast on our Indian administration by the slave fostering Republic.

Lord Ashburnham, the Conservative Envoy to Washington, has received a vote of thanks for his treaty, upon the motion of the Whig Lord Brougham, and the radical Joseph Hume. It seems that some of the members of the old Ministry, Lords Palmerston and Russell, and Mr. Macaulay, had denied any merit to the arrangements of their former associate Mr. Baring, now Lord Ashburton. This roused Mr. Hume's 'dander,' to borrow an expression from the Clock maker, and he immediately proposed a vote of thanks to the negotiator. The measure is unprecedented. It is not customary with the House to thank diplomatists who avert wars. It thanks only Generals and Admirals who are successful in conducting them. But as Lord Ashburton had been abused—as what diplomatist has not been by one party or the other?—

and more especially as Joseph Hume volunteered to spite his old friends by moving a vote of thanks to their political opponent, the Ministry consented to create a precedent. Since what time, said Napolean to Fouché, when he remonstrated against the murder of the Duke d'Enghein, have you been so sparing of the blood of the Bourbons? With equal point might it be asked of the Tory Ministers, since when have you been accustomed to set such store by Joseph Hume's opinions?

Brazil has rejected the Ministerial proposal for a new commercial treaty. She demands that her sugars shall be admitted on the same scale of duty as those of our own colonies; the alternative is, the closing a market of five millions a year against our starving manufactures, when the present treaty expires. The Brazil cabinet knows we are as powerless as the Envoy at Cabul after the insurrection, and they are resolved to dictate their own terms.

Sir Harry Inglis, the champion of the Church, who has been urging Church extension on the Ministry when not half the new churches in the metropolis are half full, has at length obtained some crumbs of comfort from Sir Robert, who proposes to aid the Church, without dipping into the pockets of the people. The reform of the Cathedrals, against which Sydney Smith protested so loudly in the inimitable letters to Archdeacon Singleton, has yielded 30,000£ which is now available. The Premier proposes to borrow another sum from ecclesiastic resources, on ecclesiastical security, to be repaid from ecclesiastical funds, and to devote, we suppose, the interest of it to the support of ministers of the Church, feeling convinced that where a congregation is raised, a church will soon follow, and that it is much more reasonable to provide a church for a congregation already collected, than to erect a church and then beat up for a congregation.

THE ORDINATION VOWS.—We are not blind as Dousterswivel seems to think. We have carefully read over the Question and Answer he has quoted, with the best of spectacles. Every thing however depends on the kind of spectacles one uses, as Major Downing of Downingville says in one of his humorous letters. Read the ordination service with the new Oxford glasses, and nothing will be easier than to discover that to "banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrine," means nothing more or less than to make perpetual war on Dissent. It was by the aid of these magical glasses that the Tractarians discovered that a belief in the invocation of Saints, and in the efficacy of holy relics, was not incompatible with a belief in the Thirty-nine articles, and with the enjoyment of Protestant livings. Our spectacles, bought of Twentyman and Co. are simple, honest glasses, and assist us only to the plain unstrained meaning of the words, in which we are altogether unable to discover the meaning which Dousterswivel attaches to them.

And what is this meaning? The Bishop asks the candidate for holy orders whether he will banish and drive away all strange and erroneous doctrine. He vows to do so by the help of God. The Preface to the form of ordaining Priests says, It is evident to all men diligently reading Holy Scriptures * * * that from the Apostles' time there have been three orders of ministers in Christ's Church, Bishops, Priests and Deacons. The asterisks should be thus filled up "and Ancient authors." Now the Dissenters though they may discover three orders in the Ancient authors have been unable to discover them in Scripture;—therefore they are to be banished and driven away with all faithful diligence. By parity of reasoning the Priest should make perpetual war on Puseyism. It is part of the belief he expresses at his ordination, that the "Holy Scriptures contain sufficiently all doctrine required of necessity for eternal salvation." It is one of the dogmas of the Oxford School that the Scriptures are not the sole, or a perfect rule of faith, and that they are to be supplemented by tradition, and therefore the Puseyites who hold this "erroneous and strange doctrine are to be banished and driven away with all faithful diligence."

This interpretation of the ordination vows has been brought forward since the S. P. G. Missionaries connected with Bishop's College have been charged with creating heartburnings and discord among the flocks of the Dissenting Missionaries. It behoves them, we think, if they covet a character for straightforwardness, to declare at once whether they intend to rest their defence on a denial of the facts, or on an appeal to the supposed necessity of aggression imposed on them by their ordination vows. We see from a long and acrimonious discussion with which the columns of the Hurkaru have been recently loaded, that they repudiate the charge, and maintain their entire innocence of any attempt to seduce the Dissenting converts. This is manly, whatever be the result of the enquiry. They can only injure their cause by setting up this theory of ordination vows; because it wears the appearance of disingeniousness, as though they intended to fall back upon the vows, and justify their aggression, if they find themselves unable to disprove it.

THE LOTTERIES.—The Hurkaru has explained the inconsistency of advertising lotteries in one page, and denouncing them as immoral in another, by saying that the Editor of that paper is not responsible for the advertisements, which are under the absolute control of the Proprietor. This fact goes far to exonerate the Editor from blame; but we wish he would use his influence with the proprietor to exclude the gambling notifications altogether. This would certainly improve the character of the paper for consistency, while the pecuniary loss it might involve would serve to give additional value to the concession. That journal, since it has been in the hands of the present editor, has risen not a little in public estimation, and its returns must have been proportionately augmented. The Editor may therefore justly claim to have some voice in the determination of a matter in which the character, and consequently the interests, of the establishment are involved.

Of the Englishman we have little hope. He has the same excuse as the Hurkaru for inserting them; the Proprietor being in London and the Editor in Calcutta; but he prefers to defend the publication on the ground that the lotteries are not as yet illegal, and that they are in the hands of respectable tradesmen. This may be true of one lottery, but of no other. If we remember aright, one of the lottery projectors was recently charged in the Englishman with having written that which was false. He cannot therefore have much respectability left; and the Englishman ought not, on principle, to advertise his lotteries again. It will at any rate be some trifling mitigation of the evil, if our contemporary will limit the advertisements in future to those tradesmen of whose respectability he has undeniable evidence. And even they would find their respectability vastly improved, if they would avoid pandering to the vicious propensities of our nature, and content themselves with an honest profit out of an honourable business.

THE BOMBAY TIMES has been severely taken to task by the officers of Scinde for the groundless charges brought against them in reference to the ladies of the Zenana at Hydrabad. Some officious and mischievous individual informed the Editor, that they had been transferred unceremoniously to the tents of the officers, and the Editor, whose indignation at the occupation of Scinde has never slumbered, considered this conduct as an aggravation of the public wrong inflicted on the Ameers; and denounced it with unmitigated severity. He has thus inflicted a serious injury on a body of honourable men, and they have requested permission of Sir Charles Napier to publish an open refutation of the charge. It will be found among our extracts.

It is perhaps needless to say that the charge is altogether unfounded. The honour of the ladies of the Zenana was guarded with the most scrupulous fidelity, after they came into our power. However our national character in this respect may have been compromized at Cabul, it is unsullied at Hydrabad. It is due also to the Editor of the Bombay Times to state that he had no sooner been informed of the unfounded nature of the charge, than he used every effort in his power to contradict it, and to counteract the mischief of which he had been made the instrument. He did not wait for a remonstrance from the officers, but spontaneously published a denial of the imputation. His conduct, after the receipt of the document from the officers, is such as to entitle him to a continuance of that public confidence and esteem, which his talents and industry have earned. Of all men, Editors of newspapers and Ministers of state are most liable to be misled; because it is the interest of others to mislead them, for their own private interests, be they fair or foul. We have all been placed at some period in this predicament. There is no paper of any note, which has not been obliged at one time or another to retract assertions published on the authority of those who appeared worthy of confidence; and hence mistrust will always stand an Editor in more stead than credulity.

The course pursued by the officers is also worthy of all commendation. Some would have advised them to seek the vindication of their character by an action at law; and thus to fix the value of their reputation by the vulgar standard of money. Every such procedure, except where the author of the calumny persists in maintaining it, wears a vindictive character, and divides public sympathy between the doer and the sufferer of wrong. They have acted upon a wiser and more magnanimous principle. Having been injured through the press, they have demanded reparation of the injury from the press, and it has been made promptly, cheerfully and effectually; and their honour is brighter than as though they had obtained 10,000 Rupees damages against the misled Editor; for, thanks to our system of law, there are so many considerations besides innocence, which go to make up a verdict, that it is always the least satisfactory reparation a man can obtain for calumny.

LIEUT. EYRE'S NARRATIVE OF THE CAMPAIGN OF 1841 IN AFFGHANISTAN.—We resume our review of Lieut. Eyre's Journal, with the greater satisfaction, as we shall next week have an opportunity of comparing his statements with those given by Lady Sale in her Journal of the Disasters in Affghanistan. Though we may therefore be later in the field than our contemporaries, our readers may find it useful, previously to entering on the review of her work, to have their memories refreshed with the facts given by Lieut. Eyre.

Our last notice closed with the capture of the Commissariat fort on the 5th November by the enemy. On the 6th, a large force was sent against Mahomed Sheriff's fort, which was stormed after a severe struggle. The Royal Garden which adjoined it was filled with Affghans, and some attempt was made to obtain possession of it, but, owing to the appearance of the enemy on a neighbouring hill, and an apparent attempt to intercept the return of the troops, the idea was abandoned. Lieut. Eyre says that it would have been easy to have occupied the garden, and to have obtained repossession of the Commissariat Fort opposite it, which had not been emptied of half its contents. But a fatality attended every movement from the first, and this measure, which would have secured many days supplies for the troops, was not attempted, and within six days after the insurrection had broken out, only a single day's provisions could be obtained at a time from the village of Beymaroo, at a very high price.

On the 9th of November, General Elphinstone's weak state of health, rendered the presence of a coadjutor necessary, and in an evil hour, Brigadier Shelton was summoned from the Bala Hissar. The appointment of General Elphinstone to command in a country like Affghanistan, but recently occupied by those whom the chiefs and people equally detested, is one of the most grievous errors of Lord Auckland's administration. It is true that he was specifically appointed from home to this division, but it was manifest to all those who saw him on his way to the scene of his command, and unhappily of his disasters and death, that he was physically incapacitated for so responsible a post; and that his mind had been affected by the weakness of his body. He should never have been sent. Brigadier Shelton came into cantonments on the 9th, despairing from the first moment of being able to save the army except by retreat, a feeling in which he was supported at first by none of the officers. To the calamity of the General's mental and bodily weakness, was now added the unwillingness of the Brigadier to assist in any movement except a retrograde one. From his arrival, the general feeling throughout the camp, whether among the officers or men, was one of despondency, which served to aggravate ten fold the difficulties and dangers of the position. The European soldiers who ought to have set an example of fortitude and courage to the native sepoys, were the first to give way to repining and despair. Next to the indiscretion of sending a General so broken in constitution as General Elphinstone, to Cabul, was that of placing a Regiment like the 44th in so critical a post. Every one knew that from the peculiar, and happily unexampled, system of discipline, to which the corps had long been subjected, a universal spirit of dissatisfaction pervaded the men and that they could not be depended on in any emergency in which their confidence in the commanding officer and their attachment to him, was to be put to the test.

On the day when Brigadier Shelton arrived in the cantonment and took a leading part in all operations, though the troops were reduced to a state of starvation, and the whole country was in a blaze of insurrection, one master mind might have overcome all difficulties, and preserved the force till the approach of succour on the opening of spring. But the General in chief was a cypher vacillating between opposite opinions, and always swayed by the last adviser; the second in command was perpetually exclaiming that the game was up, and that there was no safety but in retreat, and the Envoy stood alone in advising vigorous measures, which were received with cold apathy, and never carried into execution with effect. On the 10th, the enemy appeared in strength on the heights to the east and west of the cantonments, and took possession of a number of forts, particularly the Reeka bashee, which was situated directly opposite the mission compound, within musket shot of our works. The Envoy fearing to be hemmed in on every side, was anxious to occupy this fort. Lieutenant Melville says, that he urged this measure on the General and the Brigadier, who demurred at it, observing that they could not afford the loss of men it would entail. Sir W. Macnaghten replied, "If you do not take the forts to-day, you must take them with three fold loss to-morrow." The General asked if the Envoy would take the responsibility on himself; and he instantly said, "On my shoulders be it." About mid-day a large force issued from the cantonments and proceeded to the Reeka bashee fort. Capt. Bellew hurried forward to blow open the gate, but missed it, and blew open a wicket, so small as to admit of only two at a time. Capt. Westmacott was cut down outside, and Capt. M'Crae sabred at the entrance, but Col. Mackrell, of the 44th, made his way to the interior, with Lieut. Bird and a handful of Europeans and sepoys. The garrison fled out at the great gate. Just at this instant some Affghan cavalry charged round the corner, and the Europeans and natives gave way at once; a bugler sounded the retreat by mistake, and the flight back to cantonments became general. Major Scott, of the 44th, knowing the fearful predicament of his commanding officer, exhorted and besought the soldiers of the 44th to follow him in vain. One private, of the name of Steward, alone seconded his efforts. The Brigadier, whose personal courage was proverbial, exposed himself to the hottest fire while he endeavoured to rally the fugitives. They advanced to the attack and again retreated. A third time did the Brigadier bring them up to the assault, which now proved successful. The fort was taken, but what was the fate of those within? Col. Mackrell was literally hacked to pieces, and of all those who had entered with him, only two survived, the gallant Lieut. Bird of the Shah's force, and a sepoy. These had taken refuge in a stable, and barricaded it with logs of wood and whatever else came to hand. From behind this defence they maintained a hot fire on the assailants for a quarter of an hour, when only five cartridges being left, they were rescued by the advance of our troops, who "found the pair grim and lonely, upwards of thirty of the enemy having fallen by their prowess." The subsequent loss of Lieut. Bird in the fatal retreat, is among the most melancholy results of that deplorable event.

Brigadier Shelton having secured this fort, obtained possession of four others, but not without a loss of 200 killed and wounded. The forts were found to contain 1400 maunds of grain; only one-half of which could be brought away before night fall. Capt. Boyd requested of the Brigadier that a guard might be placed over the remainder; but this was refused, and on the following morning the grain was gone!

On the 13th November there was another engagement with the enemy who had taken possession of the heights to the west of the cantonments, and planted two guns there, which gave no little annoyance. At the earnest entreaty of the Envoy, the General agreed to send out a large party under Brigadier Shelton; but the force was not ready till 3 P. M.! The heights were carried with some difficulty; but only one gun was brought away, and that after dark. The enemy kept up a hot fire on the other gun; but as the Envoy had sent a message entreating that no effort might be spared to complete the triumph of the day by bringing away both of them, Major Scott of H. M. 44th repeatedly urged his men to descend and drag the 6 pounder, but with a few exceptions, they remained immoveable. Nor could the sepoys be induced to follow where the Europeans would not advance; the gun was therefore spiked. This, says Lieut. Eyre, was the last success our arms were destined to receive. Henceforward the narrative of operations is but a "catalogue of errors, difficulties and disasters following close on each other, which disgusted our officers, disheartened our soldiers, and finally sunk us all into irretrievable ruin, as though Heaven itself, by a combination of adverse circumstances, for its own inscrutable purposes, had planned our downfall."

On the 15th of November, Major Pottinger and Lieut. Haughton, of the Goorka Regiment came in from Chareekar, both severely wounded, the only survivors, except a few sepoys, of that gallant corps. The exertions they made to maintain their position, without success, amidst unexampled difficulties, present one of the brightest but most melancholy records of this disastrous campaign. On this occasion Major Pottinger not only sustained, but augmented the high reputation which he had acquired through the civilized world for his defence of Herat.

The success obtained on the 13th by the capture of the Reeka bashee and other forts, made so deep an impression on the enemy that they refrained from annoying our troops for three days; but the incessant fatigue to which they were subject, from the routine of garrison duty proved a severe trial to their health and spirits. There was moreover a strong probability of an early fall of snow. Every consideration therefore appeared to recommend a retreat to the strong hold of the Bala Hissar. The Envoy was from the first greatly in favour of this movement, and it is now certain that if it had been adopted at this period, it would have been successful; and that the troops, though they might have been subjected to great straits, would have been enabled to hold out till they were relieved. But the Brigadier was strongly opposed to it, in consequence of the difficulties he saw in the way, though by a singular inconsistency he was eager to try a much longer and more difficult retreat to Jellalabad, through some of the most difficult defiles in the world—an attempt which must have compromised the safety, not only of the Cabul army, but of the brave troops under General Sale. The project was therefore laid aside for the present, but subsequently discussed on successive occasions, on each of which the dangers of the movement were found to have been greatly increased.

On the 18th November, a reply was received from General Sale, to the requisition which had been made to him to return to Cabul. He represented it as utterly impracticable. The hope of his return had served to buoy up the spirits of officers and men, and great was the disappointment when all succour from that quarter appeared hopeless. The eyes of the army, which ought to have been turned upon itself and its own prowess, were now directed to the Candahar force as the last resource; but the relief which had been sent on from that post, was unable to reach Ghuzni, and returned to its own cantonments.

The troops had hitherto been supplied with provisions from the Beymaroo Hill, the proprietor of which sold them at a high price to the Envoy. Latterly, the enemy had daily taken possession of it, and thus intercepted the supplies. It was situated only half a mile from the cantonment; and the upper houses commanded a portion of the Mission compound. On the 22d, a large body of the enemy was seen proceeding towards it, and it was resolved to anticipate them. Major Swayne, of the 5th N. I. was appointed to the duty, but the affair was as shamefully mismanaged as all the others had been. "His orders were to storm the village; he would neither go forward nor retire, but concealing his men under cover of a low wall, maintained a useless fire all day on the houses at Beymaroo." The troops retired without having accomplished any thing. The next day, decided the fate of the Cabul force. After the return of Major Swayne's force, a conference was held at the General's house, when on the special recommendation of the Envoy, it was resolved that Brigadier Shelton should take the village by assault on the following morning and maintain it against any number of the enemy. A force consisting of 1100 men moved off at 2 A. M. in perfect silence and ascended the Hill, and placed the gun in position. The enemy in the village, few in numbers, were taken by surprise, and forsaking the open space, took shelter in the houses and towers. It was urged on the Brigadier to storm the village while the panic lasted; he refused to do so. As day dawned, the enemy hurried from the village so that not forty were left. A party under Major Swayne was ordered to storm the village. He missed the principal entrance, and approached a wicket which was barricaded; the enemy's marksmen took a sure and deadly aim at his men; and, the Brigadier seeing large bodies pouring forth from the city of Cabul, recalled him.

The city and country around was now roused; large masses of the enemy moved on towards the conflict, till more than ten thousand were engaged. Unfortunately, only one gun had been taken out; it was well served till the vent became too hot, and its fire slackened just at the time when it was most needed. A hundred sappers had accompanied the troops to throw up a sunga, or stone breast work, they were never ordered to do so; and the troops were thus exposed to the unmitigated fire of the enemy's rifles. Though the officers performed prodigies of valor, the men were panic struck, gave way, and at length fled. The Ghazees rushed upon them. "All order," says Lieut. Eyre, "was at an end; the entreaties and commands of the officers, in endeavoring to rally the men, were not listened to, and an utter route ensued down the Hill in the direction of the cantonments, the enemy closely following, and the cavalry in particular making a fearful slaughter among the unresisting fugitives.—Had not Osman Khan voluntarily halted his followers and led them off, of all who went forth that day to battle not one would probably have returned to cantonments." The solitary gun was carried off in triumph. Thus ended the unhappy 23d of November, which, as the Affghan's afterwards asserted, gave them the first positive assurance that the troops in the cantonments were entirely at their mercy. Lieut. Eyre notes no fewer than six military faults in this day's proceedings, and even those who have not made the art their study can perceive that it was lost entirely through the egregious mismanagement of the commander.

The troops had now lost all confidence. The officers gave way to the most gloomy forebodings. The spirits of the men were broken, the influence of the officers declined daily, and the reins of discipline were relaxed, till subordination became almost extinct, and the enemy bearded them with impunity from under the ramparts of the garrison. Even at this moment of universal despondency, Lieut. Eyre thinks that if our affairs had bee n in the hands of some master mind, they might have been retrieved. Capt. Conolly, immediately after the disasters at Beymaroo, wrote from the Bala Hissar to the Envoy, urging an immediate retreat to that fortress as affording the only chance of safety. But the General raised a host of objections to the measure, and he was vigorously seconded by Brigadier Shelton; and thus the last hope of saving the army vanished. Then commenced a series of inglorious negotiations, which were carried on with perfidy, and ended in the annihilation of the army. After the 23d of November, the commanding officers seem to have resigned themselves to the current of circumstances without a single effort to stem it. A bridge had been thrown over the river. General Shelton, seeing its vast importance in case of a retreat of which he never lost sight, had urged the erection of a field work to protect it. There was a small unfinished fort near at hand, which the sappers might have completed in a single night; and a small detachment might from thence have commanded the bridge. The enemy approached it on the 24th with the view of demolishing it; not a company was moved out to disturb them, and in the course of ten days the bridge was gone. Mahomed Sheriff's fort was left in charge of only a small detachment. The enemy attacked it, and the soldiers of the 44th packed up their bedding and retreated to the cantonment; the sepoys jumped over the wall and escaped, and the Mahomedan flag was seen waving over it, as if in derision of our dastardly inactivity.

On the 25th of November, the negotiations commenced by an overture from Osman Khan, a chief supposed to be favourable to our interests. His communication was friendly and the Envoy immediately laid it before the General, for his opinion. The General replied that we had been in a state of siege for three weeks; that the Camp was without provisions for man or beast, and that as it was impossible to retain our position in the country, the Envoy ought to avail himself of the opportunity of treating.—That same day a salute was fired in the city of Cabul to welcome Akbar Khan, who, after having been a fugitive for two years, had made his way to the city, and from that time took a principal share in the transactions by which the ruin of the army was consummated. On the 27th two deputies from the assembled chiefs came into the cantonments, with the terms of the treaty, which were so humiliating that the Envoy was obliged to reject them with indignation. The deputies took leave of him with the exclamation, "We shall meet again in battle." "We shall at all events meet at the day of judgment," replied the Envoy. Hostilities, which had been suspended during the negotiations, commenced again on the 1st of December by an attack on the Bala Hissar, which was bravely repulsed. On the 5th, the enemy completed the destruction of the bridge. On the 6th they obtained possession of Mahomed Sheriff's fort, as we have already mentioned, owing to a fresh exhibition of their New Orleans courage, by the 44th. On this occasion Lieut. Eyre deems it necessary at once to disclose the truth. It is notorious, he says, that H. M. 44th had been for a long time previous to these occurrences in a state of woful deterioration—military demoralization he should have said. The Regiment in question fell a prey to a disease which the Horse Guards alone could have remedied. Why then, in this state of military disease, was it sent into a country like Affghanistan, with the disease festering in its vitals?

On the 7th it was discovered that one day's provisions only remained in store, and Capt. Hay was sent to the Bala Hissar for a supply. Here it is worthy of remark, that the communication between the cantonments and the Bala Hissar seems to have been maintained up to this time without any interruption, and that large convoys were allowed to pass and repass without molestation. How easy would it have been to have gradually conveyed all that was valuable from the cantonments into that fortress, and then to have dashed on with the troops and at once made good the passage to it. On the 8th a Council of war was held in which some of the members thought to mend their position by a very unscrupulous abuse of the Envoy. It ended with a letter to him, dolefully describing the state and prospects of the garrison and begging him to open negotiations. This paper was signed by General Elphinstone, Brigadiers Shelton and Anquetil, and Col. Chambers. But as recrimination would not give food to the starving troops, it was determined the next morning to attack the fort of Khoja Rawash. The next morning it was found that no orders had been given for the attack, and the project fell to the ground.

We beg the reader to bear in mind that this Council of war in which the Envoy was made the object of personal abuse, and in which the officers united in intreating him to capitulate, was held on the 8th. He will also keep in view the fact, that on the next day, the 9th, intelligence having been received of a victory gained by Sir Robert Sale at Jellalabad, the Envoy conceived it might have the effect of "mollifying the General's opinion regarding the necessity of an immediate negotiation with the rebel chiefs," and addressed him on the subject. The General in his reply declared, that the intelligence, however pleasing, could not in the slightest degree influence our position so as to affect the expediency of our treating. It was probably after the receipt of this last communication that the Envoy wrote that letter to his relative, Mr. Erskine, for assisting in the publication of which he has been punished by a six months' suspension from office and pay. The letter thus acquires a double interest from the circumstances under which we now know it to have been written, and from the ample and decisive corroboration its statements have received from the pens of Lieut. Melville, Lieut. Eyre, and Lady Sale.

"Cabool, December 9th, 1841.—We have now been besieged thirty-eight days by a contemptible enemy, whom the cowardice of our troops, and certain other circumstances which I will not mention, have emboldened to assume an attitude of superiority. Our provisions will be out in two or three days more, and the Military Authorities have strongly urged me to capitulate. This I will not do till the last moment. We have rumours that a force is coming to our assistance from Candahar, and I sincerely trust it may, for we have no energy or spirit amongst those here."

Urged by the importunity of the Generals, the Envoy opened negotiations with the chiefs, whom he went out to meet on the plain towards Seah Sing, attended by Capts. Lawrence, Mackenzie and Trevor. After the usual salutations, Sir William explained to them that the continuance of the British army in Affghanistan appearing to be repugnant to the feelings of the nation, he was willing to enter into negotiations to smooth over present difficulties, and to re-establish mutual friendship between the British and Affghan Governments. He then read to them a paper in which he had written down the heads of the treaty, as it was called, rather we should say, the items of unconditional surrender. The principal articles were that the British troops should entirely evacuate Affghanistan; that Dost Mahomed Khan and his family should be released; that Shah Soojah should have the option of remaining at Cabul or returning with the British troops to Loodianah; that no British force should ever be sent again into Affghanistan, unless called for by the Affghan Government; that all spare ammunition, guns and small arms should be given up; and that the Chiefs should supply the troops with ample provisions and means of conveyance. To these terms the Affghans agreed, never intending however to fulfil one of them; and thus was concluded the most disgraceful convention into which we had ever entered since our victorious standard was unfurled at the battle of Plassey. The palliation which Lieut. Eyre offers for this ignominious treaty, must not be omitted:

"It is undeniable that Sir William Macnaghten was forced into this treaty with men whose power he despised, and whose treachery was proverbial, against his own judgment, by the pressing representations of our military heads. It is no less true that, whatever may have been his political remissness or want of foresight before the rebellion broke out, he had, throughout the perils that afterwards beset us, displayed a truly British spirit of unflinching fortitude and indefatigable energy, calculated, under more auspicious leaders, to have stimulated the zeal and valour of the troops, and to have cheered them under the trials and hardships they were called on to endure; and I can safely add, without fear of contradiction, that scarcely an enterprise was undertaken throughout the siege, but at the suggestion, and even the entreaties, of the Envoy, he volunteering to take on himself the entire responsibility. Justice demands this tribute to the memory of one, whose acts, as they will assuredly undergo the severe scrutiny of his countrymen, it therefore becomes the duty of every eye-witness, who bears testimony on the subject, not only to shield from misrepresentation, but, where they are deserving of it, to hold up to public admiration. I am led to write this solely by my public knowledge of the man."

No sooner had the treaty been concluded than Sir W. Macnaghten proceeded to act upon it with strict fidelity. The troops in the Bala Hissar were ordered to evacuate it, and this was accomplished in a day or two, though not without some difficulty, owing to Akbar Khan's treacherous attempt to get possession of that fortress. The day after the treaty of evacuation had been agreed to, the Chiefs made an unexpected proposition that Shah Soojah should continue King on two conditions, that of giving his daughters in marriage to the leading Affghan chiefs, and of abandoning the offensive practice of making the chief nobles wait for hours at his gate for an audience. To these conditions he yielded a reluctant assent.

As the retreat had now been determined on, the General ordered that some ammunition should be distributed among the camp followers, and commanding officers were ordered to indent for new arms and accoutrements. But so completely were the reins of discipline relaxed, that many of the officers sent their men to help themselves, and a scene of disgraceful confusion and plunder ensued, the camp followers rushing in by hundreds and taking away whatever they pleased. The treaty had been made on the 11th, and the first article of it was, that immediate supplies should be furnished to the troops, but no supplies were furnished for the next five days, and the horses and cattle were kept alive by eating their own dung, while the camp followers were destitute of any other food than that of the animals which expired daily from cold and starvation. On the 16th the Chiefs stated that they would afford no provisions unless the Envoy proved his sincerity by giving up all the forts around the cantonments. As our troops were now completely at the mercy of these perfidious and blood thirsty chiefs, the forts were evacuated and immediately filled with Affghans,—our Affghan "allies," as the order of the day styled them! and thus did they obtain possession of posts which commanded every part of the cantonments—and they kept their word by sending in one day's supply of atta. On the 18th the position of the army was rendered still more desperate by a fall of snow, the first of the season, which lay five inches deep on the ground. On the 19th, Sir William wrote to Col. Palmer at Ghuzni, to Capt. Rawlinson at Candahar, and to Major Leech at Khelat-i-Ghilzee, to evacuate those forts at the earliest season fit for marching. On the 20th the Envoy had another conference with the chiefs on the bank of the canal. Their demands rose with our submission, and they now insisted that a portion of our guns and ammunition should be given up, as a proof of our sincerity, and that Brigadier Shelton should be surrendered as an hostage. These demands were resisted. The object of the Chiefs was to prevail on the Envoy to treat with them separately; but he resolutely persisted in negotiating with them only as a body. Sirdar Mahomed Akbar at this interview took a great fancy to a brace of pistols which were in Capt. Lawrence's belt; and they were resigned to him at the Envoy's particular request, who little thought that within three days, they would be made the instrument of his own death. On the 21st, Sir William again met the chiefs at a conference, and it was resolved that four hostages should be given up. On the 22d there does not appear to have been any meeting between the chiefs and the Envoy, but he sent his own carriage and horses as a present to Akbar Khan.

That same night this man spread the toils in which the unfortunate Envoy was caught. At night, Capt. Skinner arrived at the Cantonment accompanied by the Sirdar's cousin, and the Lohanee chief, who brought a letter from Akbar Khan, in which he represented that it was folly to hope for any permanent treaty with the body of rebel chiefs, who had each his own interest in view; that he was grateful for the treatment which his father and his family had received from the British Government, and that he was ready to throw himself heart and soul into our interests, and to deliver up Ameenoola Khan, supposed to be the most inveterate of our enemies, on condition that he should be made Vizier under Shah Soojah who was to remain King; that he should receive a large sum of money and that our troops should evacuate Affghanistan in eight months. The unhappy Envoy, distracted by the desparate position of our troops, affixed his signature to the treaty. The whole of this negotiation was a villanous scheme got up by the chiefs to test his sincerity, and, as we may suppose, to afford some justification of his perfidious seizure the next day.

Sir William refrained from communicating the fact of this treaty to those whom he had been accustomed to consult. The next morning he directed the General to have two Regiments and two guns in readiness for action at a moment's notice. He left the cantonments at 11 A. M. "His accustomed calm and collected manner appears to have left him." On being told that the garrison was not on the alert, he replied rather petulantly: "It is all of a piece with the military arrangements throughout the siege." On approaching the banks of the Canal he unfolded the scheme to his suite; and when they represented the danger of it, he replied: "Dangerous it is, but if it succeeds, it is worth all risks; the rebels have not fulfilled even one article of the treaty, and I have no confidence in them; and if by it we can only save our honour all will be well. At any rate, I would rather suffer a hundred deaths than live the last six weeks over again."

The catastrophe is well known. The Envoy met the assembled chiefs—and among them was the brother of Ameenoola, whose surrender was to be a part of the treaty then to be ratified. Had he not been labouring under a singular infatuation of mind, occasioned by six weeks of unrelieved mental anguish, this circumstance alone would have caused him to perceive the treachery of Akbar Khan. He presented him with a fine horse he had bought of Capt. Grant; dismounted and threw himself along the bank, on a horse cloth, and was instantly seized by Akbur Khan, and dragged along. He resisted this violence, and Akbar Khan drew forth the pistol the Envoy had given him, and shot him dead. Capt. Trevor was immediately after hacked to pieces, and Captains Lawrence and Mackenzie were saved only by the exertions of some of the chiefs.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

— Among our selections will be found a brief report of the business done at the last meeting of the Agri-Horticultural Society. Mr. Speed's proposal for extending the Society's assistance to a new association, the Floricultural, which was to have come forth under his auspices, fell to the ground; the mover of the motion not having been present.

— The sum collected for a bust of Dr. Carey, the founder of the Agri-Horticultural Society, is about 1400 Rs. quite enough to procure one from a first rate, though not perhaps from the first rate artist in London. The only good likeness of Dr. Carey, was painted by his friend Home, and is now in the Library of Stepney College near London. That administration; 3. it rewards merit; 4. it has a system of national education and, 5. it promotes sound morals. Why then did Mr. Crisp blacken a Government so vastly superior to that of England?

— The Madras papers of the 9th June state, that the report of Sir Hugh Gough's being on his way down to the Presidency for the purpose of proceeding immediately to Bengal, is premature, and that he is not likely to leave Bangalore before the end of June or the beginning of July.

— The Englishman in noticing yesterday our remarks on the proposed increase of the allowance of Darogas, has unwittingly done us a grievous injury by hinting that our information is derived from official papers to which we have had access. We beg to assure him that we have not seen a single official document on the subject. We heard some time ago that such a measure was in contemplation. We heard subsequently that it had been determined on. We claim no credit for having been so fortunate as to gain the start of our contemporaries in reference to this solitary item of intelligence. They have only to recollect, how much oftener they have the advantage of us, as to priority of news, and every feeling of jealousy will vanish.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The next question which came on for consideration, was, that mooted at the last meeting by Mr. Speede, and relating to the importation of Indian wheat to the British ports.

The Committee appointed at that meeting, to consider and report upon the subject met on the 22d of last month, but after some little discussion, were obliged to come to the determination to postpone disposing of the question, until they obtain more information in regard to it. With this view a resolution was made to adjourn, and, in the meantime, to put forth a circular to the members of the Society and others, inviting information on the subject generally as well as specific replies to certain interrogations, which involved enquiries as to the nature, cost and modes of growing wheat in this country, the feasibility and desirableness of establishing such a trade as proposed, and the varieties and quality of the wheat practicable to be grown in an Indian soil.

Only one gentleman proposed at the last meeting, was elected a member, and three or four other names were proposed at the next month's meeting.

A letter of recommendation from the Colonial Chaplain of Australia to the Secretary of the Society, in behalf of Mr. Mylne was next read. It appeared, that the object of that gentleman in coming to Calcutta is not only to introduce the beautiful Swan River plants, but also to obtain tea seedlings and the silk worm for introduction in that part of the world. The Society proffered every assistance in its power to Mr. Mylne in the furtherance of the laudable objects he has in view.

The Secretary intimated to the meeting, that the actual amount of subscriptions available towards the Carey Testimonial, was a little above fourteen thousand rupees, which, with a little more, would suffice to procure a bust of the illustrious founder of the Society. It was accordingly arranged, that measures should be taken towards the attainment of this object. It is intended to procure as good a bust as possible from the native sculptor in Calcutta, under the generously proffered superintendance of Dr. Mouat, and to forward this bust with a portrait of Dr. Carey, for the guidance of the sculptor at home.

Among the various specimens, there was some Burmah Tea, forwarded by Messrs. Mackey and Co. and a small bunch of grapes from Mr. Storm's garden, a few miles from Calcutta. The former having been submitted for the opinion of a competent judge, was pronounced to be "coarse and bitter" in quality, and too inferior almost for the purpose of consumption.

The Secretary brought to the notice of the meeting the assistance formerly received from the Government in regard to valuable papers closely allied to the objects of the Society, and suggested, that an application should be made for the renewal of this indulgence. This was of course unanimously agreed to.

The Secretary further made a representation regarding the withdrawal of members and the difficulty of realizing subscriptions in arrears. He stated, that not unfrequently a member intimates his desire to withdraw from the Society, and should his subscription be in arrears, he is told, according to the rule of the Society, that his name cannot be struck out until his subscription is paid up. Little notice is taken of such an intimation from the Secretary, and the consequence proves, that the arrears continue to swell, and the party enjoys many of the privileges afforded by the Society at the Society's cost. After all, it not very rarely happens, that the subscription money is never realized at all.

This gave rise to some conversation, when it was finally decided, that on a member offering his resignation it should be accepted and all defaulters' names should be publicly advertised, after a reasonable time allowed for the payment of the money to be made.

It was likewise brought to the notice of the meeting, that a gentleman, who had been in the usual form proposed, seconded and elected a member of the Society about a year ago, had still never considered himself as such—his consent not having been in the first instance taken for the election. Shortly after the party left Calcutta, but the Secretary considering him a member all the time, never failed to forward any number of the journal, &c., to him, in the due course of business. To his surprise only a few days ago, eleven numbers of the journal were returned to him with a civil note, intimating that the party never consented to be a member of the Society, and always considered himself unworthy to be one. The Secretary suggested in reference to this case, that it should be a rule for all proposers and seconders parties for election, to be held responsible for the entrance fee of those proposed by them. This was believed to be objectionable on the ground, that it would tend to discourage members from beating about for recruits. As a warning, however, to others, it was agreed to publish the party alluded to in the above case with a resolution to the effect that the Society agree, to strike out his name from the list of members on the ground stated in his letter.—Hurk. June 15.

REMONSTRANCE OF THE SCINDE FORCE.

At a General Meeting of the Officers of the Sinde Field Force, stationed at and near Hydrabad, held with sanction of His Excellency Major General Sir C. J. Napier, K. C. B., Governor of Sinde and Commanding the Forces in Sinde to take into consideration the measures that should be adopted to refute a certain calumnious article which appeared in the Bombay Times newspaper of the 6th May last, headed ("the ladies of the Ameer's Zenana,") it was unanimously resolved?

That an address to His Excellency the Governor of Sinde be drawn up and circulated for the signature of the officers of this Force, expressive of their indignation at the unfounded and injurious calumnies contained in the above mentioned article, soliciting the protection of His Excellency, and requesting his permission to make their sentiments more generally known by circulating Copies of this address to the Indian Press for publication.

The following address was then drawn up and agreed to.

Address of the undersigned Officers of the Sinde army, stationed at and near Hydrabad to His Excellency Major General Sir C. J. Napier, K. C. B., Governor of and Commanding in Sinde.

Sir,—We the undersigned Officers of the army, serving under your Excellency's command have seen with indignation an article in the Bombay Times, newspaper of the 6th May last, closely affecting our honour and tending to degrade us in the eyes of our Friends and Country. The article in question is headed "The ladies of the Ameer's Zenana" and concludes in the following terms.

"They who, three months' since, were sharers of a Palace and in the enjoyment of the honors of Royalty are the degraded lemens of the Feringees! so it is: the Harem has been defiled, the last drop of bitterness has been mingled with the cup of misery we have given the Ameers to drink: the heaviest of the insults Mahomedans can endure has been heaped upon their grey discrowned heads. Let it not be supposed we speak of this in the language of prudish sentimentalism; the officers who have dishonored the Zenana of Kings have committed great wrong; but for that as far as the other evil deeds attending upon so unjust and cruel a conquest, the Govt. which ordained it is responsible. We know now, to our shame and sorrow, the evils which flowed from frailties such as this permitted in Cabool, and at Hydrabad we may yet discover the heinousness of our sins in the magnitude of our punishment. If one thing more than all the other wrongs we have inflicted on them could awaken in the bosom of each Beloochee chief, the unquenchable thirst of never-dying vengeance, it must be to see the sanctities of domestic life invaded and violated as they have been —to see the daughters of nobles, and wives of kings, living while youth and beauty lasts as the concubine of the infidel, thrown aside when these attractions have departed, to perish in their degradation and shame. This is the first of the black fruits of invasion for which Britons must blush. We have avoided explicitness on such a subject; our readers will be at no loss to discover our meaning:—the most attractive of the ladies of the Zenana now share the Tents of British officers. A series of acts of injustice first introduced to the Scindians the character of the British Government; what has just been related will afford them an insight into the virtues and blessings they may look for from the advance of civilization; the benefits and honors destined them by the most refined people of the world. This contrasts well with the reception English Ladies experienced at Affghan hands."

I beg to assure your Excellency from our own knowledge and inquiry as to facts, what the grave charges contained in this extract against the Officers under your command are utterly without foundation, and that not a single instance of ill-treatment or disrespect to the inmates of the Ameers Zenanas has ever come to our knowledge. Having expressed to your Excellency our deliberate conviction that the whole of the statements in the extract complained of are unfounded in truth, we respectfully solicit that you will be good enough to take such steps as you may deem advisable to clear our characters thus aspersed, in the eyes of our military superiors and comrades, and of our Friends and countrymen in India and in Europe; and that with the same end in view you will kindly permit us to circulate copies of this address to the Indian newspaper for publication.

We have, &c.

(Signed by 104 Officers.)

Hyderabad, 25th May, 1843.

Gentlemen,—Your address has given me great satisfaction. I concur in every word, and confirm every statement it contains.

We are accused by Mr. Buist, the Editor of the Bombay Times, of disgracing ourselves, our profession, and our country, by the most infamous conduct towards the women of the Zenana; and I am, personally, held up to public scorn as the immediate cause of such scandalous conduct.

You have protected your character, collectively and individually, by exposing this unprovoked and unparalleled calumny; and it is right the public should know that, so far from offering these ladies any insult, no officer of this army has even seen a lady of the Zenana.

But the officers whom I have the honour to command, are of the same class of high minded gentlemen which compose the rest of the officers of the Queen's and Company's service: the calumny therefore applies to the character of the whole military profession all will feel the insult:

This calumny is intended to make England look down upon her armies with horror and disgust; and when I consider the bad climate in which we are now serving: that dangers and privations surround us; that we have put forth our best energies to serve our sovereign and our country, and to gain the approbation of our friends; that all have served with reputation, and some of us grown grey in undishonored arms; that many of our comrades have lately fallen in battle, and by disease and that all are ready to fall; when I consider these things, I say I am at a loss to account for the feelings which induced Mr. Buist [if it be true that he is an Englishman] deliberately to make the groundless fabrication which he has put forth to the world.

which Mr. Robinson spoke of as existing in Calcutta, was begun by Chinnery for the writer of this notice; but it turned out to be a failure, and the artist was so much disgusted that he would not go on with it. It remained unfinished in his studio when he left India, and has shared the fate of his collection.

— The pilgrims to Jugunnath this year, we are told in the Hurkaru, have reached the shrine with few casualties. Some cases of Cholera had occurred. The crowd of devotees is said so greatly to exceed that of the last year, that the price of grain has been doubled.

— An official notification in the Calcutta Gazette of yesterday evening abolishes the post of Envoy at the Court of Lahore and of Secretary of Legation. Col. Richmond becomes therefore Governor General's Agent in the North West Frontier. These rapid changes of the nature of public appointments, cannot fail to inflict a serious injury on the character of the administration. Bundlekund and the Sagor and Nerbudda territories are however exempted from the jurisdiction of Mr. Clerk, and are to continue under his Lordship's own superintendence.

FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

— The Delhi Gazette states that serious differences have arisen between the Hindoos and Mahomedans at Muttra. The indiscreet exhibition of the Gates at this celebrated shrine, has doubtless contributed to inflate the Hindoos and to exasperate the Mahomedans, and it may possibly be found to lead eventually to a serious disturbance.

— An abstract of the receipts and disbursements of the General Committee of the Cabul Relief Fund is published in the Delhi Gazette, from which it appears that the amount actually collected amounts to 360,333 Rs. the amount expended, to 70,002 Rs.; and the available balance in hand to 295,431 Rs.; in addition to which the following dependencies remain to be received. Interest on deposits, 7000 Rs.—unrealized subscriptions, about 10,000 Rs.—and refund of advances 5000; when these sums have been realized the balance in hand will be, 3,17,431 Rs.

— The Madras papers describe the effect of the late gale in the interior of the country as having been very destructive. Whole villages have been swept away; more than 10,000 head of cattle have been destroyed, more than sixty lives lost, and property to the amount of more than a lakh of Rupees destroyed.

— Ali Morad, our ally in Scinde, recently obtained possession of the person of one of the refractory leaders by treachery and brought him to Sir Charles Napier. The General, like a gallant soldier and a true Briton, declared in open durbar that the English resorted to no such ignoble and dishonourable means, and set him at liberty.

SATURDAY, JUNE 17.

— The last mail brings intelligence of the safe arrival of that noble vessel the Southampton at Portsmouth. The passengers were enabled to reach London a few hours before the Marseilles mail started. All the passengers were well with the exception of Dr. Voigt, whose friends will be sorry to hear that the voyage had not improved his health. The attacks of epilepsy had come at more rapid intervals, and greatly affected his mind. The Southampton was to leave England again at the end of July, and would be ready for a return voyage in the middle of January. We hope, that notwithstanding the competition of the steamers, Capt. Bowen will be enabled to sail with a full ship.

— The grand Jury has thrown out the Bill for murder against Eastman and others, and a fresh Bill for manslaughter is to be preferred against them.

— The Madras papers announce the total loss of the Amelia Thompson, which foundered at sea, on the 23d of May. Part of the crew, consisting of the Captain and fifteen men, were in open boats from the Tuesday morning to Friday morning, when they were picked up by a native vessel and landed at Coringa. The Chief Mate and third Mate, the carpenter, steward, cook, and two seamen went down in her, not having been able to swim off to the boat.

— The Englishman has been favoured with a Memoir on Asphaltic Mastic, as applicable to flooring, roofing, &c. by an officer of Engineers. We have been for some time aware that the work has been passing through the press, and we hope it will obtain the widest circulation, which the enthusiastic author can desire. This compost is found to be far preferable to tar, which has latterly been found so valuable for floors by its long resistance of moisture. It is scarcely possible to confer a greater blessing on Bengal and all those provinces in Asia of which humidity is the crying sin, than by introducing the use of a material which will at once protect the floor from the inconvenience and danger of dampness, and from the depredations of the white ants.

— The Englishman has the following melancholy news from Ghazeepore.

"I sent you word in my last, that the Cholera had nearly ceased to be known in H. M. 29th, but since then a more fearful disease (if possible) has began to thin the ranks of this unfortunate Regiment. The Medical men call the disease that is now raging here "Apoplexy of the hot winds" it being similar in its appearance and result to a malady which proved so fatal at Chunar some years ago. No less than 40 cases have already been admitted into the Hospital, one-half of which have ended fatally, and many of the remaining I much fear will, ere this reaches you, be numbered with the dead."

— There was a hope held out sometime since in the Bombay papers, that a communication by land might be opened between Bhooj and Hydrabad so as to ensure a daily transmission of Mails to and from Bombay, but the Gentleman's Gazette seems to doubt the feasibility of it, as the intermediate country belongs to Shere Mahomed, who is up in arms against us.

— The accounts from Gwalior of the 4th instant state, that a revolution has taken place there; the Regent approved of by our Government, during the minority of the young Rajah, has been over powered by a large force, and obliged to fly the country. The houses of all his friends have been plundered. The influence of our Resident is gone, and his authority openly defied. The usurper has possession of the Royal palace and treasures, and is supported by the army. Our principle of non interference ties up our hands.

MONDAY, JUNE 19.

— The Star of this morning states, that the Sonamooky Pinnace and Soorma accommodation Boat in tow of two Iron Steamers, reached Monghyr on the 13th. These are the vessels proceeding to Allahabad to bring down Lord Ellenborough. They were not likely to reach their destination before the 22d or 23d. His Lordship was expected to reach Allahabad on the 7th, and would probably receive his May letters by the 12th or 13th, and would therefore be ready to embark immediately; but he is not expected, and indeed cannot reach Calcutta before the first week in July.

— The same journal tells us, that it is very strongly rumoured that Lord Ellenborough intends to give the Vicar Apostolic of Bengal 500 Rs. for the poor of that faith; and the like sum for a stained glass window for the Chapel of the Nunnery. If this be true, what will the pious member for the University of Oxford say? Is our contemporary serious when he asserts, as he appears to do, that Lord Ellenborough, while he strongly disapproves of Lord Auckland's political measures highly approves of his liberality, and that he is resolved to imitate it, and again to send 500 Rupees a month from Government House to the District Charitable Society.

— The latest intelligence from Scinde is from Kerachee, the 27th May. The Highlanders have 200 ill in hospital at Hydrabad, and the regiment is little above 400 strong. The weather is hot and the wind scorching. As we write this notice the thermometer before us is 94, the highest point the mercury has yet reached, but what is this to 120 in the tent in Scinde? Five officers have been carried off.

— The Delhi Gazette Press says, that His Majesty the King of Delhi has been so much edified by Mr. Macaulay's speech on the Somnath Gates, that he has ordered it to be translated into Persian. The speech, which was the speech of the evening, deserves to be translated; but we pity the poor wretch who was set to find suitable expressions in the Persian for Macaulay's magnificent eloquence.

— The Delhi Gazette informs us that the Sirdar Mahomed Akbar Khan has sent a present of six horses to the Shere Sing; and that Futteh Jung, who ascended the rickety throne of Cabul on the murder of Shah Soojah, and came away with our army, presented himself at the Lahore Court, in great pecuniary distress and was ordered to receive 200 Rupees.

— The Hurkaru gives circulation to a report that all the Danish settlements in this country—meaning thereby Tranquebar and Serampore,—have been sold for 12 lakhs of Rupees. The report is premature. The Parliament of "Young Denmark" has been urging the sale on the King ever since it had a voice, and the King has instructed Mr. Hanson to open negotiations, but it seems the parties are not agreed on the price, and the matter has been referred back to Europe. We shall not lower our Scandinavian flag much before this day twelve month.

— In the report of the last meeting of the British India Society we are told that the Report of the Committee on the new Act for the appointment of Magistrates was brought up, and that a part of the Committee was for burking it, but the majority resolved to go up and thank Government for it.

— The Fourth Session of the Supreme Court was opened on the 15th instant. The cases for trial are few, but it is remarkable that in the Grand Jury, there is not a single Civilian. They are all merchants or Native gentlemen. This undue partiality for the mercantile community is scarcely fair.

TUESDAY, JUNE 20.

— Papers have been received from Moulmein to the 31st May. They contain little intelligence of importance except that the impostor who has for some time disturbed the province has been seized and brought to Moulmein. A proclamation from Major Broadfoot, the Commissioner, denouncing the conduct of a Burmese officer who has seized a British subject, will be found among our extracts. It breathes a spirit of vigor worthy of the British Government, and will doubtless put an end to the annoyance to which British traders on the Salween have been subject. From it we learn that gun boats have been placed on the river for the protection of the trade, with directions to afford aid to those who are threatened by the Burmese. We have just heard that Mr. Blundell, has been deprived of the Straits Government to which he had recently been appointed, and that the cause of his deposition is the fact of his having placed gun boats on the Salween for this same purpose, viz. for the protection of our trade. We shall make more particular enquiry about this measure which wears at present all the appearance of vindictiveness, and offer our own observations on this extraordinary procedure next week.

— Mr. Crisp, an English trader at Rangoon, has been ordered by Tharawaddy to quit the Burmese territories—he had previously left them—for having written a letter which appeared in the Calcutta Star, in which the misrule of that Government was severely exposed. We did not know that the King of Burmah read the Star as well as the Englishman. Mr. Crisp has come forward to make the amende honourable, and now declares that the Burmese Government has five cardinal virtues. 1. It gives cheap food; 2. cheap

Gentlemen; your reputation and mine are inseparable, and I assure you that my best exertions shall be united with yours to defend our private character as gentlemen and our military character as soldiers.

We have seen a great many contrivances in Calcutta, for very damp floors; sheets of lead, roman cement, plaster of Paris, and tar or pitch have all been tried with various success. We have now before us a Memoir on Asphaltic Mastic, as applicable to Flooring, Roofing, Hydraulic works, &c, in India, by an Officer of the Engineers. The author remarks that the materials in common use in India for these purposes, are frail and perishable, unable to resist the wear and tear to which they are exposed from a variety of causes, and afford little protection from damp or from the attacks of white ants or other insects.

The employment of the proposed bituminous cement, was suggested by finding that it had been employed in some ancient fortifications at Pyrmont supposed to be of Roman construction. These works having been pulled down about 45 years ago, experiments were made upon the utility of this cement, which proving entirely successful, led to its extensive adoption, first in France and then in England. It appears to be a natural combination of bitumen with carbonate of lime. It is used by reducing the material to powder and mixing with a proportion of pitch and fine grit, and when in a semifluid state is poured out into the spaces, which it is required to fill, in moulds prepared to receive it. The Company who prepare it for sale in England, send it abroad in blocks which only require to be heated for use. When properly applied the mastic possesses nearly the hardness of stone, with a slight elasticity which prevents the surface from wearing or chipping, so that even carriage wheels do not affect it. One great advantage in its use is the facility of removal, after having been laid down for years as a terrace in one building, it may be taken up and removed to another. It is incombustible, so that it possesses an important advantage over wood. But what is of more importance in Bengal, is its total imperviousness to moisture, so that it may be employed to line tanks, vats or reservoirs. On the continent, it has been extensively employed for various purposes. It is stated that pavements laid down in Paris six years ago, are still in excellent order, and even the severe trial of cavalry barracks has not impaired it. It has been used largely for roofs, and for the floors of public buildings, gaols, colleges and churches. It has also been found highly useful as an hydraulic cement. For ornamental work it is particularly well adapted, admitting of being worked into patterns, or laid down in alternate colours like marble.

The author of the memoir thinks that the mastic might be made here with the earth oil of Rangoon, after extracting the naptha. He calculates the expense at about Co.'s Rs. 12 to Co.'s Rs. 15 per 100 feet, exclusive of the substratum over which it is to be laid. The memoir contains minute directions for use which we shall not detail here, as they would be scarcely intelligible without figures, and those who undertake to work it will of course make themselves perfectly masters of the mode of application. We should be glad to see it generally applied to floors in Calcutta, for nothing can be worse than the soft chalky mortar with which they are now in general covered, making a mat indispensible which being nailed down, causes an accumulation of dust, and affords a lodgment for ants and other insects. In our opnion a floor that could be daily washed with clean water is better suited to this climate than any other, and when it can be made highly ornamental, as is the case with the Asphaltic mastic, it unites beauty and convenience in a manner which cannot be matched by any other substance, except the very expensive ornamental marbles. The Metcalfe Hall would afford an excellent opportunity of trying the mastic if it is procurable in a sufficient quantity. The author of the memoir states that an experiment has been already tried here, and we believe with perfect success. Any quantity could of course be supplied from England if time were allowed.—*Eng. NOTIFICATION.

BY MAJOR G. BROADFOOT, C. B.
Commissioner in the Tenasserim Provinces.

1. Credible information has been received, that the Burmese Officer at Kokareet has arrested and imprisoned a British subject, named Nga Shoay Gya, who was peaceably coming down the Salween River, with a raft of timber.

2. The same Burmese Officer is reported to have also demanded a duty on all timber, belonging to British subjects, coming down the River Salween, and to have stationed armed men to compel them to land on the Burmese bank of the river.

3. Explanations have been demanded on this subject from the Governor of Martaban under whose orders the Officer at Kokareet is, and there can be no doubt they will be promptly afforded and such reparation made as the case demands.

4. But in the mean time, the Commissioner notifies to all British subjects, that the navigation of the Salween River is entirely open to them; and that no Government but their own, has any right to levy duties on them, or their goods, while passing up or down this river.

5. They are, therefore, hereby forbidden to pay any duties to the Officer of any foreign Government on the Salween, or to land on the Burmese shore for this purpose, even though threatened by armed men. If so threatened they must immediately repair to the nearest gun-boat, and measures will be immediately taken for their effectual protection and that of their property.

6. All persons desirous of conveying timber or other merchandise up or down the Salween, are directed not to proceed without an armed guard, which will be furnished to them on application, in Moulmain at the Commissioner's Office; at Kokareet to Captain McLeod, Principal Assistant to the Commissioner, or other European Officer, and at other parts of the Salween to the Officer in charge of gun-boats, or commanding the troops.

7. All persons paying duty to foreign Governments on the Salween, or landing on the Burmese shore by order of foreign Officers, or otherwise contravening the above Regulations, will be apprehended and sent to Moulmain for trial.

8. The British Government has not left the Authorities in these Provinces without abundant means of protecting its subjects from every enemy. This protection will be given to all who are peaceable and obedient; therefore no payment of duty or obedience to foreigners will be permitted.

9. The Commissioner thinks it right to make known his firm belief, that the conduct of the Burmese Officer at Kokareet is entirely without sanction or knowledge of the Government of Ava, and will call down its displeasure on those of its Officers who act so flagrantly against its known intentions; but in every case the inhabitants of these Provinces will receive the perfect protection in all just rights, which the British Government every where gives to its subjects.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

MINE GOOT FRIEND,—You must be blind. You say in your last that you "carefully read over the form and manner of ordaining Deacons and Priests" and that you "could no where discover any oath or vow, which could be tortured into an obligation of perpetual war on Dissent." Where were your eyes? Where your spectacles? that you did not see what follows—or seeing did not discover what it meant?

The Bishop.—Will you be ready, with all faithful diligence, to banish and drive away (very warlike worts) all erroneous and strange doctrines, contrary to God's word?

Answer.—I will, the Lord being my helper.

What is this, mine goot Friend, but a vow, and a vow of aggression on Dissent which is "erroneous" enough, God wot! though unhappily very far from "strange"? For look ye to the Preface to the Form and Manner of Ordaining Bishops, Priests and Deacons and what is the first thing that meets your eyes? Why this—"it is evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture * * * that from the Apostles' time there have been these orders of Ministers in Christ's Church, Bishops, Priests and Deacons." But Dissenters deny this and many other Church declarations altogether, and therefore they are to be banished and driven away with all faithful diligence, as aforesaid.

Verily, mine goot Friend, thou must be blind.

Your's,
8th June, 1843. DOUSTERSWIVEL.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The 39th annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held at Exeter-hall on the 3rd. The report, which was very voluminous, commenced by congratulating the members of the society upon the fact that a much larger distribution of the Holy Scriptures had taken place last year than on any preceding one. The total amount received during the year applicable to the general objects of the society (including subscriptions, donations, legacies, dividends on stock, and contributions of auxiliary societies) was 39,821*l.* 7*s.* The amount received from sales of Bibles and Testaments was 52,287*l.* 12*s* 3*d.*; for drawbacks, 367*l.* 3*s.* 5*d*, making the total amount received from all sources 92,476*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* The number of Bibles and Testaments issued by this society from their depositories at home, was 727,830; from their depots abroad, 254,230; making the total number 982,060. The total number of Bibles and Tastaments issued since the commencement of the society in 1804 was 15,020,994. The report adverted to the vast prospects which had been opened in China for the exertions of the society, and proceeded to state that very urgent demands were made by the natives of New Zealand for the Holy Scriptures. 280*l.* had been received from Tahiti towards the funds of the society.

The forty-third annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society was held May 2nd, at Exeter Hall. The Report stated that the income during the past year had exceeded 115,000*l.*, a sum unprecedented in the history of this or any other religious society. In a short time the society will turn its attention to China.

The report read at the annual meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society entered into full details of the operations of the society during the past year in India and Africa, and which contained an allusion to a proposed alteration in the constitution of the society, whose labours it is proposed ere long to extend so as to take in the whole world beyond the British isles. It appeared that 32,500*l.* had been raised by means of the Jubilee fund; and that the other receipts for missionary purposes amounted to 21,198*l.*; of which the sum of 15,280*l.* was for general purposes, and the remainder given for special objects. The promulgation of the Scriptures, and the increase of the members and schools of the society during the year, had been considerable.

At a special meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, on 28th of April, the Rev. Ernest Haukins was, on the recommendation of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, President, unanimously elected secretary in the room of the Rev. A. M. Campbell, resigned.—London Mail.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Our Summary of the incidents of the last month comprises two events of an important character—the birth of a Princess, and the death of the Duke of Sussex. We have the happiness of stating that the latest bulletin gives a favourable report of the health both of her Majesty and the Royal infant. It is unfortunate that such auspicious news should be marred by the contrast of the mournful details which come upon us at the latest hour, of the funeral ceremony of her Majesty's Uncle. Some consolation, however, may be found in the fact that all classes and conditions of men, whatever their political feelings, join in a tribute of respect and admiration for his memory. The Duke of Sussex literally gained "golden opinions from all sorts of people." The Duke of Wellington in the House of Lords, and Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons, vied with each other in expressions of esteem and eulogy towards him. As a politician he was consistent, as a member of Royalty illustrious and dignified, and as a Christian and a man he fulfilled his duty, by the exercise of charity and the support of useful institutions. He was a liberal patron of literature and the arts, and the friend of the "desolate and the oppressed." Seldom in England has there been a more general and unanimous display of regret at the loss of any public man.

In the political world nothing of a very exciting character has transpired during the month, if we except the agitation against the educational clauses of the Factory Bill. The number of petitions against this bill is almost unprecedented. The Dissenters object to it on the ground that it is an invasion of the rights of conscience. It will be seen, however, that Sir James Graham has consented to make some very essential modifications in the bill, although, at the present time, it seems, very doubtful whether the Government will be able to pass it.

The Anti-Corn-Law League has continued its demonstrations during the month, both in the metropolis and the country. It is beginning to assume very considerable importance.

There has been a dearth of foreign news of importance, and in the absence of it the occupation of Tahiti by the French has given rise to a vast extent of denunciation against the government of Louis Philippe, which is accused of an attempt to put down Protestantism in that island.—Atlas.

ACCOUCHEMENT OF THE QUEEN.—BIRTH OF A PRINCESS.—On the morning of the 25th April, at 5 minutes past 4 o'clock, the Queen was happily delivered of a Princess; His Royal Highness Prince Albert, several Lords of Her Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council, and the ladies of Her Majesty's Bed-chamber, being present.

Her Majesty was taken unwell about half-past 1 o'clock. Dr. Locock, Dr. Ferguson, and Sir James Clark, were immediately sent for, and after their arrival messengers were despatched to the Duchess of Kent, Sir Robert Peel, the Great Officers of State, the Home Secretary, the Lord Chancellor, and other great functionaries. Owing, however, to the delay, and to the very short time before the birth took place, being only three hours and a half from the moment the medical men were first sent for, all the official personages were too late, with the exception of the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward of the Household. The rest remained at the Palace until a bulletin was issued, and then took their departure.

The Princess is said to be a remarkably fine infant, not so delicately formed as the Princess Royal, and in features more resembling the Prince of Wales. She has large, light blue eyes.

The only difference in the medical attendance on this occasion from that at the birth of the Prince of Wales was, that the services of Mr. Blagden were dispensed with.

This great and important news was immediately made known to the town by the firing of the Park and Tower guns; and the Privy Council being assembled as soon as possible thereupon at the Council Chamber, Whitehall, it was ordered that a form of Thanksgiving for the Queen's safe delivery of a Princess be prepared by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be used in all churches and chapels throughout England and Wales, and the town of Berwick upon-Tweed, on Sunday, the 30th of April, or the Sunday after the respective ministers shall receive the same.

Should her Majesty's health and strength continue to improve as rapidly as may be fondly anticipated, after the recent interesting event, the Queen and her illustrious consort, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the newly-born Princess, will leave Buckingham Palace for Claremont about the 20th inst. The stay of the Court at Claremont will be prolonged until within a few days of the period of the Ascot races, which will commence on the 13th of June. Her Majesty is expected to proceed to Windsor, and to remain at the Castle until the departure of the Court to Ireland. No period has yet been fixed for her Majesty's visit to Dublin; but it is not expected that the Sovereign will leave England until the latter end of July or the commencement of August. Indeed, it is not anticipated that the gorgeous fittings in the interior of the Royal Victoria and Albert yacht will be completed much before that period.

The following is the Form of Prayer and Thanksgiving to Almighty God for the safe delivery of the Queen and the happy birth of a Princess, to be used at morning and evening service, after the General Thanksgiving, in all churches and chapels:—

"O Merciful Lord and Heavenly Father, by whose gracious gift mankind is increased, we most humbly offer unto Thee our hearty thanks for Thy great goodness vouchsafed to Thy people, in delivering Thy servant our Sovereign Lady the Queen from the perils of childbirth, and giving her the blessing of a daughter. Continue, we beseech Thee, Thy fatherly care over her; support and comfort her in the hours of weakness, and day by day renew her strength. Preserve the infant Princess from whatever is hurtful either to body or soul, and adorn her, as she advances in years, with every Christian virtue. Regard with thine especial favour our Queen and her Royal Consort, that they may long live together in the enjoyment of all earthly happiness, and may finally be made partakers of everlasting glory. Implant in the hearts of Thy people a deep sense of Thy manifold mercies, and give us grace to show forth our thankfulness by dutiful affection to our Sovereign, by brotherly love one towards another, and by constant obedience to Thy commandments; so that, passing through this life in Thy faith and fear, we may in the life to come be received into Thy heavenly kingdom, through the merits and mediation of Thy Blessed Son Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

SPAIN.—The Cortes were opened by the Regent on the 3d inst. In the course of his speech he alluded to the moment, as happy and glorious, when the young Queen shall take the reins of government. The speech states that economy and reduction were about to be applied to the army, when the Barcelonese insurrection came to mar these good intentions. The paragraph of the speech respecting the finance is by no means satisfactory. General Espartero candidly admits that, under the present system of finance, "the difficulty of obtaining a complete and satisfactory organisation of that vital part of the administration of the State must every day become greater." Upon the whole, however, the Regent alluded to the position of Spain in congratulatory terms. He says:—"To perfect the administration, to complete the development of every branch of the public wealth, and to raise the institutions of the national militia, of public instruction and charity, to the height they deserve, and worthy of the Spanish name, the laws to be proposed by the Government, and in accordance with the constitution, will be found effectually to contribute; at the present moment I have the satisfaction of announcing to you that peace and order reign throughout the whole kingdom."—Atlas.

THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.—In our retrospect of the events of the past month we have to include the lamentable announcement of the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. This painful occurrence took place on April 21, soon after mid-day. For about ten days his Royal Highness was attacked with erysipelas, but the disorder gave no uneasiness to his medical attendants, and, at first, was not attended with any dangerous or even unfavourable symptom. In the course of the week an alarming change took place, and on Thursday night such a crisis appeared to be approaching, that an intimation was made to her Majesty and to several other branches of the Royal family.

His Royal Highness's brother, the Duke of Cambridge, was present at the time when the fatal event took place. The Duke died with perfect calmness and composure, as became a sincere Christian and a good man. He was sensible almost to the period of his dissolution, and a short time before, he desired that his servants, who all entertained for him great regard and respect, should be allowed to take their last leave of him. The Duke attempted to speak to them, but his strength failed him, his voice faltered, and in a few minutes he ceased to exist.

His Royal Highness Prince Augustus Frederick was the ninth child and fifth son of his Majesty George the Third, and was born the 27th of January, 1773. His titles, besides the Ducal one, were Earl of Inverness, and Baron of Arklow; he was a Knight of the Garter, a Knight of the Thistle, Grand Cross of Hanover, and a Privy Councillor; High Steward of Plymouth, Ranger of St. James's and Hyde Parks, Colonel of the Hon. Artillery Company, Grand Master of the United Order of Freemasons of England and Wales, President of the Society of Arts, a Fellow of the Royal Society, and for some time was President of that learned body; a Doctor of Civil Law, and an Official Trustee of the British and Hunterian Museums.

The Duke of Sussex was twice married, although neither of the marriages received the sanction of the Royal Marriage Act—first to Lady Augusta de Ameland Murray, at Rome, April 4, 1793, and in London, Dec. 5, 1793, which marriage was declared null by the Prerogative Court in August following. The issue of this marriage are, Sir Augustus d'Este, born January 13, 1794, and Ellen Augusta, Mademoiselle d'Este, born August 11, 1801. Lady Augusta Murray survived her separation from her illustrious husband until March, 1830. The Duke's second wife, Lady Cecilia Gore, daughter of the second Earl of Arran, survives his Royal Highness; she was created Duchess of Inverness, March the 30th, 1840.

In 1801, upon his creation as Earl of Inverness, a grant was voted by Parliament of 12,000*l.* per annum, and an annual addition of [illegible],000*l.* was afterwards made.

Although his late Royal Highness was attached to the Whig party, yet he had gained the respect of the Conservatives, and, indeed, of men of all shades of political opinion. He was a warm patron of the arts, a distinguished scholar, a man of taste, genius, and enlightened intellect, and, in short, in every respect a gentleman, and an honour to the illustrious house to which he belonged.

In him the principles of civil and religious liberty found a warm advocate, and his vote was ever recorded in favour of all measures calculated to ensure the freedom and independence of the people. Although a sincere Protestant, the Duke, with a truly religious spirit, was tolerant to other creeds, and it will be recollected that he was a warm advocate of Catholic emancipation. The late Duke had been long a patron of freemasonry, and practised the benevolent principles inculcated by the craft. He was, as already stated, the Grand Master of the United Order of Freemasons in England and Wales. So inscrutable is fate, and so doubtful the events of this world, that it had been the intention of his Royal Highness to preside at the Grand Annual Masonic Festival, which was appointed to take place at Freemasons' Hall on Wednesday, the 26th ultimo. We have said that the late Duke was a patron of the arts. He was also the friend of literature, and was, by some, termed a bibliopolist. In the latter character he had made a larger and more valuable collection of bibles than any man in Europe. His library contains many rare and esteemed works. The Duke, from his boyhood, was what is termed a great smoker, and had a curious and unique set of pipes. One of his attendants was exclusively employed in taking care of them.

It is no servile compliment, but the language of truth, to assert that the Duke of Sussex was beloved in the circles in which he moved, and respected by the whole nation. Although by his order he might be supposed to be attached exclusively to Royalty, he was the friend and defender of the people. That he possessed a benevolent mind, his connexion with, and contributions to, so many charitable institutions afford ample proof. His hand was, indeed, "open as day to melting charity." Peace to his manes.—Atlas.

THOMAS CLARKSON, ESQ.—This venerable and distinguished man attained his 84th year on Tuesday last. We are happy to say that he was well enough to drive into Ipswich on the previous Saturday.—Ipswich Express.

SUDDEN DEATH OF THE EARL OF HOPETOUN.—The Earl of Hopetoun, who had come from Brighton yesterday morning to attend the House of Lords, left there after the debate at a late hour, in a hackney cab, for Stevens's-hotel, Bond-street, and on the cabman opening the door, on his arrival there, found the earl speechless. He was removed into the house in an apparently lifeless state. Dr. Wardrop was immediately sent for, but found the earl quite dead; and there can be little doubt his lordship must have expired in the cab without a struggle. The late earl was born in 1803, and sat in Parliament as Baron Hopetoun and Niddry. An inquest was held yesterday, when the above facts being stated in evidence, the jury returned a verdict of "Died by the Visitation of God."—Atlas.

DEATH OF THE HON. LADY ERSKINE.—We have to announce the death of the above estimable lady, wife of his Excellency Lord Erskine, British minister at Munich. The melancholy event took place at Genoa on the 25th ult.

The treaty between France and England was signed in London on the 3rd inst., and is to come into operation on the 1st of June next. By this treaty the rate of postage between France and this country is nominally reduced one-half; but as it is stated that the new charge is to be on letters weighing less than half an ounce, the reduction is really much more than half in the aggregate.

The report that has gone the round of the papers, of His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge's appointment as Colonel of the Staff in the Ionian Islands is premature, if not unfounded.

It is generally understood that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to signify to the Duchess of Inverness that she may continue to occupy the apartments in the Palace so long inhabited by his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex; but that, as the Duchess will keep up a more limited establishment than the late Duke, it is expected her Grace will select a suite in the wing for her household, leaving the other rooms at the disposal of Government.—The Duchess, who has been indisposed, has been visited by the Queen Dowager, the Duke, Duchess, and Princess Augusta of Cambridge; and the Queen and other members of the Royal Family have sent to make inquiries.

The marriage of the Earl of Leicester and Miss Whitbread took place at the pretty village of Cardington-cross, Bedfordshire. The hour appointed for its celebration was nine o'clock; but long before that period, crowds of persons had assembled from Bedford and the surrounding villages. The churchyard, and road leading to it, were already thronged with elegantly-dressed spectators, when, at a few minutes before [illegible], the bridal procession left Mr. Whitbread's vill[illegible] Hon. and Rev. T. Keppel officiated, and throughout the ceremony the youthful bride and bridegroom sustained their self-possession, and took part, with evident feeling, in the beautiful service of the church. On the conclusion of the ceremony, the bridal party returned to the villa, amidst the congratulations of the crowds assembled, and shortly after, the happy pair departed for Holkham-hall, Norfolk, the beautiful seat of the noble earl. The event was celebrated at Bedford by a dinner at the Castle Rooms; and, in order that the poor might participate in the rejoicings, Mr. S. Whitbread provided dinner for about 500 persons. A dinner was also given to the tenants and farmers, at the King's Arms, Cardington, and the evening concluded with a ball and other rejoicings, in honour of the occasion.—London Mail.

THE POET LAUREATESHIP.—Her Majesty has paid a befitting tribute to the genius of Wordsworth, by offering him the laureateship vacant by Southey's death. The great poet, however, at first respectfully declined the offer on account of his age. He entered his seventy-fourth year last week, and, happily, enjoys good health. We are glad to hear that, in consequence of communications from Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Wordsworth has since accepted the appointment.—Atlas.

A Mr. Bain, of Wotton, near Wick, announces the discovery of an electrical printing telegraph, by means of which he can, "by one set of types, set up a newspaper in London and print it simultaneously in every town in England and Scotland nearly as fast as the steam-machine throws off the sheets."

On the 20th the first stone of the new courts of law in Lincoln's Inn was laid by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, assisted by Lord Lyndhurst, in the presence of a large assembly. After the ceremony was concluded, a dinner took place in the court of the Lord Chancellor. It was originally intended that Prince Albert should have performed the ceremony, but in consequence of not having a more suitable place to entertain his Royal Highness, it was abandoned. The Prince will, however, be invited to a sumptuous banquet on the completion of the buildings. The erection is to be executed in the Tudor style, with red bricks and stone dressings. The roof will be of carved oak, the first of the kind since the time of Charles II., when Archbishop Juxon had the hall of Lambeth Palace, now the library of that venerable edifice, roofed so. The new hall at Lincoln's-inn is to be 120 feet long, 45 feet wide, and 62 feet high, being higher than any hall in England, except that of Westminster. At the lower end of the hall will be a magnificent vestibule, running to the height of the building, and groined on stone. Right and left of the vestibule will be the Benchers' counsel-room; and the drawing-room; and the library, to which access is to be had by an arched doorway from the vestibule, concludes the building. It will be 80 feet in length, 40 feet wide, and 45 feet high. Judging from the plan of the erection, as also from the models, which excited universal admiration, the proposed erection will add ornament to utility.—London Mail.

At a meeting of the local council of the British Association held at Cork, it was resolved that this learned body should commence its next session in that city on 17th of August. The attendance is likely to be very large.

Sir Charles Metcalf, the new Governor-General of Canada, arrived at Boston, on the 20th March. He had met with due honours on landing at Halifax, and been most courteously received in the United States. Sir Charles had by the last accounts reached Kingston.

Sir Charles Bagot had had a serious relapse, and was understood to be again past hopes of recovery.

Boyer, President of Haiti, had arrived at Port Royal in the British brig of war Sylla, having resigned the government. He brought with him 900,000 dollars.

The West India Islands which have suffered by the earthquake are stated to be—Guadaloupe, Antigua, Nevis, Montserrat, Bermuda, St. Kitt's, St. Bart's, St. Eustatia, and St. Martin: and the amount of British property destroyed, is estimated at 3,000,000*l.* sterling: French, 1,000,000*l.*; Swedish, 3,000*l.*; and Dutch, 8,000*l.*

A second earthquake was experienced at the north point of Guadaloupe on the 3d of March. At the time a captain of a vessel off the north point of the island, stated that it shook the vessel with such severity that it was with difficulty the crew could keep their feet. A dense cloud of smoke ascended from the vicinity of the Basseterre, and serious fears were entertained for the safety of that place. It was quite sickly at Point à Petre, caused from the offensiveness of the ruins of the town. The comet seen at St. Thomas's on the 2nd of March was so brilliant as to cause an alarm to the inhabitants. A shock of an earthquake was also felt at St. Thomas's on the 5th about half past nine o'clock at night. No material damage was done.

Accounts from Texas to the 18th ult. had been received at New Orleans. It was rumoured, but the rumour wanted confirmation, that a proposition has been made by Captain Elliot, the British Consul-General, to the Texan Government, to abolish slavery within the limits of the Republic; and that upon its agreeing to do so, he was authorized to say that England would effect the peaceable recognition of Texan independence by Mexico.—London Mail.

Accident to Mr. Brunel.—The Bristol Gazette of Thursday says, "It is with regret we have to state that the valuable life of this talented engineer has been placed in jeopardy by an accident arising out of an amiable wish to amuse the children of a friend. The father and Mr. Brunel pretended, by slight of hand, to pass money from the mouth to the ear, and vice versa, when Mr. Brunel, placing a half-sovereign in his mouth, it unfortunately slipped into the trachea, where it stuck, and every effort to remove it proving ineffectual. Sir B. Brodie has been called in, and an operation, by making an incision in the thorax, determined upon. All endeavours to remove the coin from its very dangerous lodgment have proved ineffectual, although no less than three incisions have been made in the throat for that purpose by Sir B. Brodie, assisted by Mr. Aston Keys, Mr. Thompson, &c. The only mode by which nourishment can be administered to Mr. Brunel is through a glass tube, and the aliment is, of course, in a liquid state. Mr. Brunel is in an extreme state of exhaustion.—Atlas.

The Paris and Rouen Railway.—Two experimental trips have been made on the new railway between Paris and Rouen, which was publicly opened and inaugurated by the Dukes of Nemours and Montpensier on Wednesday.—Atlas.

Railway Taxation.—A return to an order of the House of Commons, on the subject of railway taxation, has just been printed, and contains some curious details. The total amount of tax paid on English railways in 1832 was only 639*l.*, namely, 18*l.* by the Leicester and Swannington Company, and 621*l.* by the Liverpool and Manchester; whereas, during last year, one company alone (the London and Birmingham) paid 25,940*l.*; another (the Great Western), 25,804*l.*; a third (the Grand Junction), 13,545*l.*; and a fourth (the South-Western), 12,043*l.*, being upwards of 77,000*l.* from four of the principal companies. In 1837 we find the Greenwich Railway paying 858*l.*, and the Grand Junction and London and Birmingham then appearing for the first time, the former at 5,005*l.*, and the latter at 1,282*l.* They have since been as high as Grand Junction (1840), 15,030*l.*; and London and Birmingham (1841), 26,227*l.* The figures exhibit a serious falling off in the amount of duty during the last year.—Ibid.

Another Explosion at Dover Cliffs.—On Tuesday afternoon there was another explosion at Dover Cliffs. This blast proved proportionably successful in effects to the unparalleled one, when, with the enormous quantity of 18,500lb. of gunpowder, the destruction of Rounddown Cliff was effected on the 26th of January. The mass of chalk operated on formed the base of the same cliff, the crown of which to the depth of ninety feet, was blown off by a blast consisting of 7,000lb. of gunpowder, on the 2d ult. The present blast consisted of upwards of 10,000lb. of gunpowder, which was placed in fifteen cells or chambers, at proper distances along the base of the chalky cliff about to be removed, and the conducting wires being properly placed, all were fired off at once, as on the last occasion, by an apparatus invented by the junior engineer Mr. Hodges, which simultaneously communicates ignition by means of the voltaic battery to any number of wires attached to it, with a single motion of the hand. This blast, like the others, was characterised by absence of noise or smoke, the only difference being that on the present occasion a large quantity of chalk blocks and rubbish was projected in the air to a considerable distance seaward. The shock was felt for hundreds of yards round, and the fissures created in the top of the cliff presented a most terrific appearance. This explosion created quite as great a sensation as the great blast of Rounddown.—Ibid.

The Isle of Skye has within the last 40 years furnished the public service—21 Lieutenant Generals and Major Generals; 45 Lieutenant Colonels; 600 Majors, Captains, Lieutenants, and Subalterns; 10,000 foot soldiers; 120 pipers; 4 Governors of British colonies; 1 Governor General; 1 Adjutant General; 1 Chief Baron of England; and 1 Judge of the Supreme Court of Scotland. The Generals may be classed thus:—8 Macdonalds, 6 Macleods, 2 Macalisters, 2 M'Caskills, 1 M'Kinnon, 1 Mac-Queen, and 1 Elder. The Isle of Skye is 60 miles long, and 20 broad. Truly the inhabitants are a wondrous people. It may be mentioned that this island is the birthplace of Cuthullin, the celebrated hero mentioned in Ossian's poems.—London Mail.

A terrible and fatal explosion happened at Waltham on the 13th, at the Government-buildings for the manufacture of gunpowder. One of these was a corning-house, composed of two parts, separated by a traverse or buttress of solid material, twenty feet thick; in the first part there were, as near as can be ascertained, about 2,300 pounds of gunpowder, and in the second about 2,000 pounds. At a distance of about 170 yards from the southernmost of these, stood the granulating-house, similar to the one just spoken of, with two parts separated by a buttress. In one part of the corning-house seven men were at work. Mr. Sadd, the master-worker, had just entered the building; and whether a bit of grit had got into the machinery, or the men had hastened the machinery on the approach of Mr. Sadd, who was rather severe, or from whatever cause, at five minutes before three o'clock in the afternoon the building blew up, with a loud explosion; not one of the men escaping death. In a few moments the second part of the building blew up with another explosion—a minute more, and one part of the granulating-house blew up—and in a few more moments a fourth explosion destroyed the second part of that. Of the seven men, five were carried to a great distance across the river, the body of one rising to such a height as to make an indentation some inches deep in the ground where it fell; heads were blown off, legs broken, and one body was ripped up! Sadd was found a hundred and thirty yards from the buildings. One of the men had been half a century in the works.—Ibid.

The Aerial Steam-Carriage.—It is understood that the first line to be established is that to India, the carriages leaving the top of the Monument, Fish-street-hill, every morning, and taking five minutes at the summit of the Great Pyramid, for refreshments, and to allow the passengers a short time to stretch their legs. From this point balloons will be continually starting for the most important cities of the African Desert. The carriage is then to proceed to India, thus (should the weather be not foggy) affording to the traveller a delightful coup d'œil of the most interesting countries of the East. The arrangements are in every respect very complete. Lord Brougham is understood to have accepted the office of patron, being himself of rather a flighty nature. The provisions will be carried easily in the conductor's waistcoat, as by a new invention the essence of three sheep can be concentrated into a small lozenge. The waiting-room for the ladies at the Great Pyramid is of the most commodious kind, the ancient sepulchral chamber of King Cheops being fitted up in the Oriental style for that purpose. Passengers who should wish to be dropped at any of the intermediate towns may be lowered by small hand balloons at the usual cab prices. N. B. The "Rocket," Aerial Steam-carriage, will start on Monday next for a tour round the Comet, proceeding by easy stages along the Milky Way. Sir J. Herschel has been engaged as conductor, being the only person who knows the exact road.—Punch.

There was a sale on 26th at Mr. Sotheby's, of the very valuable collection of autograph letters, records, and documents connected with English history, formerly the property of the celebrated antiquary Dr. Millers, Dean of Exeter, and President of the Antiquarian Society, who died in 1784, together with some other remarkable autograph letters. Some of the letters from remarkable persons brought good prices: an autograph letter from Sir Phillip Sidney produced 4*l.* 6*s.*; an autograph note of Oliver Cromwell was sold for 7*l.*; it was in fine preservation, and bore date 1648. At the last meeting of the Royal Society a paper was read "On a Method of proving the three leading properties of the Ellipse and Hyperbola," by Sir Frederick Pollock. The method, though founded on a well-known property of the circle, is described to us by a very competent judge as distinguished by perfect originality, and demonstrated with great clearness and eloquence. That a good lawyer should also be a good mathematician is nothing surprising, (for where should a first wrangler succeed if not at the bar?) but that a gentleman at the head of his profession, and holding a public office of the first importance, should, amid the multifarious, arduous, and harassing duties which he has to discharge, and discharges so well as Sir Frederick Pollock does, be able to snatch a leisure hour to contribute to the philosophical transactions of his country, and inclination so to employ it, is surprising, if not indeed without a precedent in the history of Attorneys-General.—Ibid.

The Mercantile Advertiser contains the following curious and interesting statement:—"The census which was simultaneously taken in every parish in Ireland, on a given day, in 1841, and which has occupied a considerable staff in its preparation for publication, will soon be printed and laid before Parliament. A variety of curious and interesting details will be supplied for the first time. The exact amount of the population, rated according to sex and age—the diseases which are most prevalent and fatal—the number of insane persons under restraint, with other statistical details, will, we understand, be given with a surprising degree of accuracy. The following is a return of the population:—

| Increase between 1831 and 1841 | 407,872 |

"From this it appears that the increase during the ten years up to 1841 was 557,702 less than it had been in the ten years preceding. This extremely reduced rate of increase is a very remarkable and extraordinary fact. It is evident that, during the last ten years, there has been a very decided check to the progress of population in Ireland.

"The increase in England, during the ten years from 1831 to 1841, was 2,004,794, which was more than one-seventh upon the population of 1831."

The overland mail is arrived, and we should have believed that the nature of its intelligence was calculated to have been received with greetings of no ordinary degree of pleasure. The journalists, however, seem to be far from entertaining pleasurable feelings at the news; and we must confess we are inclined greatly to question the policy of the English leading papers, thus publishing for the well-satisfied eye of foreign powers such wholesale condemnation which the Times and Chronicle lavish on the proceedings in India. The following are the articles to which we allude:—

Our intelligence from India, which we announced in a second edition on Thursday, realizes all our prophecies. The usual routine of aggression, conquest, and spoliation has been completed. Scinde is now annexed in the territory of the English empire. Such is the termination of our negotiations for the navigation of the Indus. We began by treating for the privileges of traffic; we have ended by seizing a friendly territory. We first lulled the suspicions of the Ameers by professions of amity; we then stipulated for the residence of agents, who were instructed to maintain a tone of friendly confidence, and to propose a reciprocity of commercial advantages with the natives; we, finally, drove their princes from their hunting-grounds, and worsted them in their attempt to vindicate the honour of their country. We have consummated by violence what we commenced in treachery. We will not attempt as yet to hazard a conjecture as to the results of this new conquest. We are not at present sufficiently acquainted with the condition of the acquired territory, nor with the effects already produced by its new relation to the British Government. Neither are we disposed to augur immediate danger, even from so unjust an usurpation. Our Indian empire has been based upon a policy which if not altogether unjust nor altogether violent, must be acknowledged to have been not very scrupulous. And our political sins have brought their own punishment along with them. With every addition to the bulk of our immense possessions, the difficulty of governing them has increased. Whenever our Indian power may be fated to be destroyed, there can be no doubt what the proximate cause of its fall will be—mole ruet suâ. Until the arrival of our despatches with more ample intelligence, we are unable to speak distinctly as to the intentions of Lord Ellenborough—whether the brilliant victory at Hydrabad has slaked or only whetted his appetite for conquest—whether he intends to emulate Lord Wellesley in a new field of foreign adventure, or Lord W. Bentinck in a category of domestic reforms. We hope that his good sense will at last get the better of his vanity, and that he will now abide by his professed intentions to cultivate the arts of peace in the vast empire which has been delegated to him.—Times.

In an early second edition of Thursday's Chronicle we were enabled to publish an outline of the intelligence from India in anticipation of the Overland Mail. It announces the important fact that "the Governor-General had declared Scinde to be annexed to the British dominions." This acquisition of territory and treasure (about 1,000,000*l*. sterling was found in Hyderabad,) following immediately on the heels of military triumph, is too consistent with the history of our dominion in India to excite any surprise, after the victory of General Napier at Hyderabad. When Burnes first applied for permission to pass up the Indus, he was told that he could not be allowed "to see the territory of the Ameers, for the soil the English looked upon they were sure to take." If this be not literally true, it may at least be said that the soil the English fought upon they are sure to keep. And pretexts for fighting are never wanted if the prize be only brilliant enough to tempt the ambition or rapacity of the ruler for the time being. A political agent—a treaty—a breach of treaty, real or implied—an invasion—a victory—then annexation of territory. Such is the progress of aggrandisement in India. A few months ago we were begging a right of way for our armies through the territory of the Ameers. They granted it. We passed; achieved our object, returned unmolested. Within a month of our receiving the tidings that the last of our soldiers had passed the Indus in safety, we have intelligence that the territory of the chiefs who had befriended us has been invaded, their people massacred, their capital despoiled, and the whole country "declared to be annexed to the British empire." For all this there may be ample justification. The Government, Sir Robert Peel tells us, has as yet received no information from Lord Ellenborough; and as we have been so often charged with unfair attempts to run down the character of the Governor-General, we shall defer any opinion upon his share in the responsibility of these proceedings until we have more detailed information than that contained in the brief announcements which we published yesterday. But if Lord Ellenborough be not the most culpable, he is certainly the most unfortunate of Governors-General. Having declared his determination to turn the resources of British India into channels of peaceful improvement, and to confine the empire within the limits already established, the very first act of his government that follows this announcement is a military enterprise having few parallels even in the annals of Indian warfare, and an extension of territory that may compete with any former act of wholesale spoliation. Possibly, as we have suggested, Lord Ellenborough may have been driven, by considerations stronger than any of mere expediency, to perpetuate the policy by which we have acquired and governed India since we first set foot upon its soil; and this act, which has been by anticipation stigmatised as one of hasty rapacity, may have been fully justified by military and political necessity. But a case of very strong necessity indeed must be made out to reconcile public feeling in this country to the seizure of the territory and treasures of a powerless and hitherto an inoffensive. if not valuable ally.—Chronicle.

"The increase in Ireland, during the same ten years, was 407,872, which was little more than one-twentieth of the population of 1831.

"The increase in England has been in the ratio of nearly three to one, as compared with Ireland. This is the first time that Ireland has shown a less degree of increase than England."—London Mail.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SLAVERY IN THE EAST.—APRIL 10.—Mr. S. Wortly called the attention of Government to a matter which deserved serious attention. He found in a list of papers, printed for the house, having reference to the negotiations between Lord Ashburton and the United States, on the 8th article of the treaty of Washington, the copy of a report presented to the Government of the United States by two officers of the American navy, selected by that Government to make the report in question specially on account of their personal acquaintance with the extent and nature of the slave trade on the coast of Africa. After explaining their view of the arrangements which it would be desirable to make on the subject, those two gentlemen made at the close of their report a most surprising and astounding statement. Having referred to the slave trade on the west coast of Africa, those gentlemen proceeded to talk of the slave trade on the east coast, and stated:—"From the best information we can obtain, it seems that a large trade is carried on by Portuguese colonies, the Arab chiefs, and negro tribes. Their greatest markets are the Mahomedan countries bordering on the Red Sea and Persian Gulf, the Portuguese East India colonies, Bombay, and perhaps other British possessions in the East Indies. This part of the trade is probably in the hands of the Arabian vessels."

Sir R. Peel conceived that the hon. gentlemen was, of course, aware of the circumstances under which the document to which he referred had been communicated to the House. The noble lord opposite asked the Government to lay on the table certain papers referred to in the message of the President of the United States and certain correspondence in relation to the right of visit. He (Sir R. Peel) acceded to that request, and among the papers so furnished was the report by two American naval officers; and he certainly had not considered himself entitled to exclude the passage referred to from that report, which contained the observations made by those two American officers to their own Government. But his hon. friend must not suppose that any sanction was given to statements of the kind in question, because he (Sir R. Peel), in compliance with a motion for information, had laid the documents on the table of the House. At the same time, he was glad to have the opportunity of correcting the erroneous impressions to which the allegations in the report might possibly give rise. With respect to the slave trade being carried on by British subjects, in India, or natives of India under British control, there was no ground for believing that any such practice existed. This was a subject which had occupied much of the attention of the late and the present Governments—he alluded to the best mode of effectually suppressing everything partaking of the character of the slave trade and slavery in India. To this subject, it was but fair to say, Lord Auckland had directed much attention, and many communications had taken place with respect to the alleged traffic of slaves on the coast of India. It was impossible to deny that such traffic did occasionally take place, and in the territories of the Nizam to a considerable extent; and that it occasionally found its way through the British territory into interior districts over which the Indian Government had no control. In Nov. 1841, an agent of one of the Ameers of Scinde was brought to trial at Bombay for taking four Arab girls from Bombay to Scinde. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to three or five years' imprisonment. The jury recommended him to mercy, but the Government refused to interfere, and the sentence was in course of execution. Therefore, to say that there was no slave trade in individual cases carried on in India, would be to make an assertion not consistent with fact. At the previous sessions at Bombay four other parties had been brought to trial by the intervention of the British authorities for a similar offence, and were convicted and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. The Government had no control over the parties, unless the offence was committed in the territory of the Indian Government; but the cases he had mentioned afforded a conclusive proof that the Indian Government were applying the British law as far as possible for the correction of this great evil. There was a number of Arabs in some parts of India—persons who were really in the condition of slaves, but who called themselves the wives of those with whom they lived, and it was very difficult, with all the care and caution that could be adopted, to prevent occasional instances of slavery and the slave trade; but the impression that the paragraph referred to by the hon. gentleman was calculated to create that any slave trade was carried on by British subjects in India was without foundation. Every possible means were adopted to check the practice wherever it was found to exist, and by a singular coincidence an act would come into force that very day which would have the effect of materially interfering with the possibility of the slave trade even by parties over whom the Indian Government had no control. By a recent regulation there had been established, under certain provisions, Vice-Admiralty Courts on the coast of India, and the governors of all the British territories in India had been invested, by instructions sent out last summer, with the same powers as those possessed by the governors in the West Indies. On this day, as he had before stated, there came into force in India a measure of great importance. This measure, for amending the law regarding the condition of slavery within the territories of the East India Company, was founded on suggestions made by Lord Auckland, and was to take effect on the 6th or 10th of April, 1843. The following was the substance of its enactments:—"1. It is hereby enacted and declared, that no public officer shall, in execution of any decree or order of Court, or for the enforcement of any demand of rent or revenue, sell or cause to be sold any person. or the right to the compulsory labour or services of any person, on the ground that such person is in a state of slavery. 2. And it is hereby declared and enacted, that no rights arising out of an alleged property in the person and services of another as a slave shall be enforced by any civil or criminal court or magistrate within the territories of the East India Company. 3. And it is hereby declared and enacted, that no person who may have acquired property by his own industry, or by the exercise of any art, calling, or profession, or by inheritance, assignment, gift, or bequest, shall be dispossessed of such property, or prevented from taking possession thereof, on the ground that such person, or that the person from whom the property may have been derived, was a slave. 4. And it is hereby enacted, that any act which would be a penal offence if done to a free man shall be equally an offence if done to any person on the pretext of his being in a condition of slavery." He apprehended that these enactments would provide increased means for putting down the abuse complained of; and he thought he had satisfied the House that the attention of the Government had been for some years directed to this important subject.—London Mail.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.—The Solway, West India Steamer, left Falmouth on the 3rd of April, with the usual mails on board, and arrived at Corunna, where, having taken in coals, she left the harbour on her outward voyage at half past nine o'clock the same evening. She passed the lighthouse about ten o'clock P. M., and was proceeding at full speed, when at about twelve o'clock midnight she struck upon a sunken rock. Immediately on the vessel striking, Capt. Duncan ordered the engines to be backed, and this having been done, she came off apparently easy, the violence of the concussion having probably caused her to rebound in some slight degree. Her head was now put towards the shore, and all speed made, in the hopes of grounding the ship, and thus saving the passengers and crew. The injury she had sustained was, however, of too serious a character to allow this to be accomplished, and within a very few moments of the ship striking, it became evident that she was setting fast by the head. She had still good way upon her, the engines having apparently suffered no injury, when, while proceeding towards the shore, as described above, a general rush was made to the pinnace, which hung at the davits on the larboard side; twenty-five persons got into her, and having seated themselves, cried out to those on board to "lower away," which was answered by some of the crew as soon as possible, and the pinnace fell into the water. The ship had still full speed upon her, and a heavy sea struck the boat as she floated for an instant, and swept every soul into the water. One or two sailors only, who hung on the tackle, succeeded in again reaching the vessel. Ten minutes only had now elapsed since the vessel first struck, during which every exertion had been made by the officers of the ship, with Capt. Duncan at their head, to get the larboard life-boat afloat. While thus engaged the boiler suddenly collapsed, and an immense quantity of steam, dust, ashes, and flames burst forth from the engine-room. All on board thought that the vessel was now about to blow up, and two or three persons were so much alarmed as to jump overboard. By great exertion the larboard paddle life-boat was eventually capsized over, and in righting half filled with water. The gig had previously been lowered, and ten persons had got into her and rowed away. The first and second cutters were also afloat, each filled with the passengers and crew. Mr. Wilder, the chief officer, with Mr. Lane and two or three other officers, now lowered themselves into the life-boat, and brought her alongside the gangway. The engines had entirely ceased working from the moment the boiler collapsed. The water had now reached the fires, and the ship, it was evident, could not float many minutes longer. Capt. Duncan and the other officers now handed the passengers into the life-boat, exerting themselves to the utmost to save all the female passengers. Fifty-two persons were already in the boat, and Capt. Duncan was still handing in others, when a general cry rose of "She is going!" and giving one tremendous plunge, she went down head foremost, leaving the life-boat, already half filled with water, afloat. The life-boat now drifted away, and so great had been the confusion arising from the hope to save all on board, that it was only then discovered that she had neither oar nor rudder. Shoes and hats were used to bail out the water with which she was more than half filled, and after drifting about for a quarter of an hour, she fell in with the second cutter, having Lieut. Hemsworth, the Admiralty agent, and several others on board. From this boat they obtained one oar, and Lieut. Hemsworth then returned to the wreck with the cutter; shortly after they fell in with the first cutter, which was greatly overloaded. They took several persons from her, and obtained a bottom-board; Mr. Wilder, the chief officer, going on board the cutter, and taking the life-boat in tow, Corunna-hill being all the time visible. At daybreak, the mast from the first cutter was stepped into the life boat, and her lugsail set, when she steered towards Corunna, and on entering the harbour was met by a Spanish launch, which was coming out in search of the boats, having heard of the catastrophe from those who escaped in the gig, which had made Corunna so early as five o'clock in the morning. The launch took the life-boat and cutter in tow, and brought them safely in, when the survivors were landed, and every attention paid to them by the authorities. At a short distance from the mouth of the harbour a signal was observed. A steamer bore down towards it, when it proved to be the pinnace, described above as swamped at an early period of the catastrophe. It contained a young man named Michael Bradley. The steamer afterwards proceeded to the spot where the wreck took place. It appears that the ship sunk in about fifteen fathoms water, and about four miles from the shore. Eight or ten persons succeeded in reaching the rigging before she went down, and as the upper portion of the main and mizen masts were several feet above the surface of the water, they were enabled to hold on until daybreak, when their situation was observed from the shore, and some boats put off to their assistance. Lieut. Hemsworth, the Admiralty agent, had remained in the vicinity of the wreck during the night, but his boat was quite full, and he was totally unable to render any assistance to the unfortunate creatures who still clung to the rigging. The weather was tolerably moderate, or the lives of the whole crew must inevitable have been sacrificed. The following is a list of passengers who are lost.—Mr and Mrs. Fitzjames, four children, and servant; Mrs. Haly; Mr. Montefiore; Miss Beadon; the Rev. Mr. Bassom; Mr. Le Main; Mr. Blake, Royal Engineers; Mr. Burtchell, Royal Engineers; Mr. Hunter; Mr. Nicolle; and Mr. Cartwright. Officers and crew lost, 18. Total, 35.—London Mail.

In consequence of the loss of the Reliance and the Conqueror, East Indiaman, off Cape Grisnez, near Boulogne-sur-Mer, the French Minister of Marine is having a maritime survey made of the coast of France, so as to ascertain the present state of the lighthouses, and the erection of others where they may be most required, so as to prevent a similar catastrophe to that which happened to the above two ill-fated vessels. A similar survey is being made by order of the Trinity House, as to the state and efficiency of the lighthouses in the Channel and along the British coast, particularly that part facing France, the lights of the one (especially Dungeness and Cape Grisnez) often being taken for those of the other. The following appears in the Journal du Pas de Calais:—"A notice has been given by the Minister of Marine that the following lighthouses at Dunkirk and Gravelines, in the département du Nord, have been completed, and will be lighted on the 1st of May next.—'Dunkirk Revolving Light. The new lighthouse stands in lat. 51 deg. 3 min. N., and long. 2 deg. 22 min. E. of Greenwich, on the head of the pier between the harbour and Fort Risban, and 1,531 yards in a N. W. direction from l'Hengueraer Tower. To a vessel distant four or five leagues, the light will appear to revolve, being eclipsed once every minute, but within that distance a faint steady light will always be visible between the periods of the strong glare. The building is 180 feet high, and the light being 193 feet above the level of the sea, will be visible from a ship's deck at the distance of six leagues. On the first appearance of this light the present temporary light will be discontinued. Gravelines Fixed Light.—The new lighthouse, from which a fixed light will be shown (on the 1st of May), stands in latitude 51 deg. N., and long. 2 deg. 6 min. 48 sec. E. of Greenwich, to the eastward of the pier's-head at the entrance of the harbour. The building is 83 feet high, and the light being 193 feet above the level of the sea, will be visible from a ship's deck at the distance of six leagues. Honfleur Lights.—On the 1st of April instant, the outer light at Honfleur, on the outer extremity of the jetty, was changed from the natural colour to a red light.'"—London Mail.

A treaty with France on Post-office affairs has been brought to a conclusion, and will come into force next month. The more immediate result of diminishing by one-half the cost of sending letters from England to France, and from France to England, is but a small part of the object of this treaty. It considerably reduces the cost of postage on all letters passing through France, as well as on those addressed to France, and therefore at once affects the vast correspondence between this country and our East India possessions. It also regulates and reduces the cost of correspondence between the British colonies and France, and, of course, between France and our colonies. It facilitates the correspondence with those European countries to which France is the highway from Great Britain, and gives to this country the advantage of the postage arrangements subsisting between those countries and France.

The following order, relating to those places beyond the territories of the East India Company to which letters are sent by the overland mail, has recently been issued by the Post-office :—

"General Post Office, April, 1843.

"Letters for China, the Australian settlements, New Zealand, the Mauritius, or other places beyond the territories of the East India Company, intended to be sent by the overland mails through India, must be addressed to the care of correspondents in that country, as it is understood, that, under recent regulations, they will otherwise be detained at Bombay for payment of the transit and ship-letter postage due to the Indian Post-office for their conveyance to their destination.

"It is not necessary that letters for places within the territories of the East India Company, forwarded by the India mails, should be addressed to correspondents in India, provision being made for payment of the Indian postage above alluded to in those settlements.

"By command,
"W. L. MABERLEY, Sec."

The appearance of the above has created great surprise, not to say indignation, in the city. It involves a declaration that all persons who may not have correspondents in India are to be utterly debarred from communicating with their relatives and friends in those places which are without the Company's limits. The merchants are not much affected by it, as they have correspondents to whom they can direct their letters; but a multitude of persons whose letters would be purely of a domestic nature are most cruelly prevented from writing to those for whose safety and prosperity they feel the deepest interest. The relations of the English now in China, of the emigrants in New Zealand, while they know that their situation is fraught with danger, cannot address a single line to them if they have not formed a connexion with Bombay, or some other place in India. Surely an arrangement might be made for receiving in London an amount of postage which would cover the carriage of a letter all the way to China or elsewhere, for the parties who have friends abroad would rather pay a trifle more than find their letters stopped altogether. The only interest the Post-office can have is in the maintenance of its own revenue, and yet this order is of a nature calculated to do that revenue a positive injury, as it renders the conveyance of many letters absolutely impossible. The order requires immediate amendment, for certainly never was declaration made with less regard to the wants of the public.—Ibid.

France.—The marriage of the Princess Clementine with Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg Gotha was celebrated on the evening of the 20th of April, at the Palace of St. Cloud. At nine o'clock, the King, Queen, and the Royal Family entered the Gallery of Apollo, which had been prepared for the celebration of the civil marriage, the King giving his arm to the Princess Clementine, and Prince Augustus to the Queen. Next came the King of the Belgians, with the Dowager Queen of Spain, the Duke Ferdinand of Saxe Coburg, and the Queen of the Belgians, the Duke and Dutchess of Nemours, the Duke de Montpensier and Princess Adelaide, the Duke Alexander of Wurtemberg, and the Hereditary Princess of Saxe Coburg Gotha, and the Hereditary Prince, and Prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg.

The witnesses were—for Prince Augustus, Baron de Kœnneritz, Minister Plenipotentiary of the King of Saxony, and the Marquis de Rumigny, the Ambassador of France at the Court of the King of the Belgians; for the Princess Clementine, Baron Seguier, first Vice-President of the Chamber of Peers, M Sauzet, President of the Chamber of Deputies, and Marshals Gerard and Sebastiani. Among the persons present at the ceremony were all the Ministers Secretaries of State.

The Royal Family and the witnesses having placed themselves round a circular table, Baron Pasquir, the Chancellor of France, who filled the functions of the civil office, assisted by the Duke De Cazes, the Grand Referendary, and M. Cauchy, the Keeper of the Archives of the Chamber of Peers, read aloud the Marriage Act, and, after receiving from Prince Augustus and the Princess Clementine the declaration required by the 75th article of the Civil Code, declared in the name of the law, that the Prince and Princess were united in marriage. The signature to the act then took place. The august couple, their Majesties, the Princes and Princesses, and the witnesses, respectively signed it. The act was closed by the Marshal-President of the Council, the Keeper of the Seals, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, by the Chancellor, and the Grand Referendary.

Shortly after the act was signed, their Majesties, the Royal Family, and the whole assembly repaired to the chapel, where the Bishop of Versailles celebrated the religious marriage.

The Court went into mourning on 2nd May, to last 11 days, for the Duke of Sussex.

There died lately at Paris a remarkable person—Count Ribbing Leven, one of the assassins of Gustavous III., King of Sweden.

Notwithstanding the disclaimers of the French Government, and the confidence of Lord Aberdeen, there is an intention to set to work earnestly to make the recent occupation of Tahiti as available and profitable as possible. The Marine Minister has asked the Chamber for 240,000*l.*—five millions of francs—for the expense of establishments at the Marquesas and Tahiti. He estimated the annual expense at 100,000*l.* The force to be sent is 1200 men. Admiral Roussin defended the grant in a plausible speech, in which he affected a great desire to protect the foreign missionaries and the Protestant religion.—London Mail.

Madagascar is at present exciting considerable attention in France. At Paris, there have been splendid exhibitions of the most costly article preparing for the court of Tananarivo, which have been ordered by the Queen of the Hovas, consisting of massive crowns to deck her royal brow on days of grand ceremonies, and some more convenient and lighter ones for her habitual use. Two consist of gold circles surrounded with foliage of the same metal, and flowers ornamented with jewels, mounted upon flexible stalks. One of them has for its peculiar ornament a globe, on which stands a hawk, that bird of prey being the symbol of the Hovas' nation. The Queen's dresses are made of the finest velvet or scarlet woollen, lined with silk of the same colour; her scarfs of red Cashmere, or velvet, also lined with silk. Those garments are covered with embroidery of the finest gold, the designs of which have been drawn at Tananarivo. One of the designs has required above 200*l.* worth of gold. The shoes are red, embroidered with gold. The stockings, of the most beautiful silk, have their sides embroidered with gold of considerable thickness. All the gloves have likewise gold embroidery. Amongst other useful articles destined for her Majesty Queen Ranavalou-Manjaka is a knife and fork of exquisite workmanship. The blade of the one and the trident of the other are of massive gold, the handles of pink coral, carved with extreme delicacy by the most skilful workmen of Marseilles. Each represents a sort of thyrse, surrounded with flowers and fruit.

All the grand dignitaries of the court of Tananarivo will also have reason to be satisfied. The richness and elegance of the coiffures and costumes intended for them exceed all belief. Among them are to be seen schapskas of red or green velvet, embroidered in gold, and ornamented, like the caps of our lancers, with plates which represent the hawk; there are helmets lined with or plated with gold, and coats loaded with lace at every seam. A uniform of green velvet, with twice more gold embroidery on it than is to be seen on the very rich ones worn by marshals, is destined for the general of the Hovas troops. The trousers which accompany it are white, embroidered on all sides, and all over the part which covers the thighs: large boots of red morocco, also intended for the happy possessor of the aforesaid two splendid articles, are likewise embroidered in front and over the instep.

Nor has the Madagascar Church been forgotten; for its priests are intended truly incredible coiffures, very high, and loaded with jewels and little bells; gold sashes all ornamented with cayman teeth in odd numbers, and necklaces which cover almost the chest and back. The ladies of the court are to have necklaces of all sorts and shapes, as well as ear-rings and rings. For the military there are lances, decorations, large epaulettes, and sashes en torsade, which exactly represent an enormous colonel's epaulette encircling the whole body.

For the Queen's boudoir, an arm-chair, à la Voltaire, has been made, which is of the utmost elegance. It is of rosewood, with incrustations. But the most remarkable articles of furniture of this curious exhibition are, certainly, the arm-chair, which is to be her Majesty's throne, and the palanquin, which is de-tined to carry her through the streets of her capital on national or religious fêtes. The parasol, executed to procure her shade when she reviews her troops on horseback, is likewise a pattern of both elegance and solidity. It is red, and ornamented with a quantity of gold embroidery.

All these curious objects have been executed under the direction of M. Delastelle, a Frenchman, long settled in the kingdom of the Hovas, who carries out, also, 25,000 muskets for her élite troops, a solar microscope, two or three military bands, organs with a number of exchange cylinders, machines for making butter, apparatus for making tea and coffee, &c.—London Mail.

RUSSIA AND SERVIA.—Our accounts from Constantinople of the 7th inst. are of importance. On the 2d M. de Boutenieff and Baron de Lieven waited on Sarim Effendi, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, "to communicate to him the ultimatum of the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh relative to Servia." "Russia requires that Prince Alexander voluntarily abdicate the sovereignty of that principality, and that in case of his refusing to do so, the Porte pronounce his deposition, and order a new election. Russia likewise demands the recall of Kiamil Pasha from Belgrade, because of his active participation in the last Servian revolution. The instructions of the Russian envoys were to wait till the 10th for the reply of the Sultan, and if not given by that time they were to return to Russia. The Turkish government had as yet made no approach to concession, and it was believed that, should no satisfactory answer be given by the 10th, M Boutenieff would demand his passports. It appears that immediately after the Russian Ambassador had withdrawn from the Porte an extraordinary council was assembled. The Sultan, on the other hand, sent for Redschid Pasha, with whom he had an interview of four hours; and the next day he gave him another audience. It was generally believed that Redschid Pasha would be ere long called to an important post, or be despatched on an extraordinary Mission to St. Petersburgh.—Atlas.

RUSSIA AND SERVIA.—Our accounts from Constantinople of the 12th ult. mention that the quarrel between Russia and the Porte respecting Servia continued undecided, but the prevailing opinion in the Ottoman capital was that the Sultan would ultimately submit. This belief was becoming the more general, as the policy of the British Cabinet was understood to be identical with that of the Austrian Government, which had already openly declared itself in favour of the construction of the treaty as urged by Russia.—Ibid.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR OF BENGAL.

29th May, 1843.

Mr. C. Mackay, Principal Sudder Ameen of Mymensing, for four months, under Medical Certificate, to take effect from the 26th ultimo, the date on which he relinquished charge of his late office as third Principal Sudder Ameen of Chittagong.

Mr. J. H. D'Oyly made over charge of the office of Special Commissioner, Calcutta Division, to Mr. H. Moore, the Special Commissioner of the Moorshedabad Division, on the 31st instant.

Mr. W. H. Martin, Session Judge for the trial of Thugs, resumed charge of his office from Mr. H. P. Russell, Judge of Moorshedabad, on the 31st idem.

ERRATUM.—In the Calcutta Gazette of Wednesday, June 7th, 1843, page 616, under the head of Leave of Absence—For "Mr. J. B. Elliott, a Judge of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut, for ten months, on Medical Certificate, under Section XVIII. Chap. III."—Read Section VI. Chap. II. of the Rules of 29th January 1840.

The following instructions for Commanders of Vessels proceeding up the Moulmein River, are ordered to be published in the Calcutta Gazette:

Notice is hereby given, that as the Sands in the Moulmein River often shift, causing the Channel for Ships to alter in many places, the Buoys can only form a safe guide.

All former sailing directions are hereby cancelled, and the following substituted:

The Buoys are painted Black and Red. All Black Buoys to be kept on the right hand, and all Red Buoys on the left hand in going up the River.

66th Regt. N. I.—Lieutenant J. S. Phillpotts, from 12th June, to 12th August, to visit the presidency, and appear before the examiners of the College of Fort William.

At a General Court Martial, assembled at Ferozepore, on the 19th day of May 1843, Badul, Khodadad, Nubby Bux and Akbar Khan, all Sepoys of the 60th regiment native infantry, were arraigned on the following charges:—

Charges.—"First charge, against Badul. For having, on the 16th day of April 1843, at Ferozepore, wilfully and maliciously killed and murdered Boodoo Sing, Trooper, of the 5th troop 1st brigade of horse artillery, by inflicting with a sword, on his shoulder and neck, two mortal wounds, from the effect of which he, the said Boodoo Sing, then and there immediately died.

"Second charge, against Khodadad, Nubby Bux and Akbar Khan. For having then and there been present, and aided and abetted the said Badul in the killing and murder of the said Boodoo Sing, as above stated."

Finding.—"The Court, after the most mature deliberation, and from the evidence before them, are of opinion

"On the 1st charge, that the prisoner Badul, Sepoy, 60th regiment native infantry, is not guilty.

"On the 2d charge, that the prisoners Khodadad, Nubby Bux and Akbar Khan, Sepoys, of the 60th regiment of native infantry, are not guilty.

"The Court having found the prisoners not guilty of the charges exhibited against them, do acquit them of the same accordingly."

Confirmed.

(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General,
and Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

26th May, 1843.

The prisoners are to be released from confinement, and ordered to return to their duty.

At a Native General Court Martial held at Neemuch, on Monday the 15th day of May 1843, Hurkissen, Chuttra, Rookna and Kissery, Camp-followers, were arraigned on the following charges:

Charges.—"1st charge against Hurkissen. For having, at Neemuch, on the 5th day of April 1843, wilfully and maliciously assaulted Bheerbhan, Camp-follower, and wounded him on the chest with a knife.

"2d charge against Chuttra and Rookna. For having at the above mentioned time and place, been present, and aided and assisted the said Hurkissen, while he wounded the said Bheerbhan.

"3d charge against Kissery. For having, at the time and place above mentioned, been present, and instigated and abetted the said Hurkissen, in the above stated assault and wounding of the said Bheerbhan."

Finding.—"The Court, from the evidence before them, are of opinion, that the prisoner Hurkissen, Camp-follower, is guilty of the first charge; and that the prisoners Chuttra and Rookna, Camp-followers, are each of them guilty of the second charge; the Court find the prisoner Kissery, Camp-follower, not guilty of the third charge, and do acquit him.

Sentence.—"The Court sentence the prisoner Hurkissen, Camp-follower, to suffer imprisonment, with hard labour, for two (2) years; and the prisoners Chuttra and Rookna, Camp-followers, each of them to suffer imprisonment, with hard labour, for six (6) calendar months.

(Signed) "SHAIK KHODABUCCAS,
Subadar and President.

"Neemuch, 15th May, 1843."

RECOMMENDATION TO MERCY.

The Court beg respectfully to recommend to the merciful consideration of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, the prisoner Rookna, if her youth, inexperience and near relationship to the principal offender, may be considered to extenuate in a degree her misdemeanor.

Approved and confirmed.

26th May, 1843.

The prisoners Hurkissen and Chuttra are to be made over to the civil authority at Ajmere, for the purpose of undergoing their imprisonment with labour.

The prisoner Rookna is pardoned at the recommendation of the Court.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 29th May, 1843.

The Cawnpore division order of the 6th instant, issued on the requisition of the Officiating Magistrate of Futtehpore, directing Assistant Surgeon J. Harrison, M. D. acting as Garrison Assistant Surgeon at Allahabad, to proceed to Futtehpore, for the purpose of performing the civil medical duties at that station, in the room of Assistant Surgeon Marshal, M. D. is confirmed.

The Allahabad garrison and cantonment order of the 2d instant, directing the Commissariat to furnish a 2 bullock hackery, for the conveyance to Cawnpore of three wounded Sepoys, of the 37th regiment of native infantry, is confirmed.

Cornet T. Penton, of Her Majesty's 3d regiment of light dragoons, is appointed to do duty at the Landour depot, during the present season.

Meer Ameer Allee, Sowar, of the 3d regiment of irregular cavalry, is, in consequence of his unfitness for further duty, discharged the service, from the 1st instant, and, with the sanction of the Right Honourable the Governor General, allowed a donation of six months' pay.

ERRATUM.—In General Orders of the 18th of January last, transferring certain men of the 54th regiment of native infantry, to the pension establishment, for "Drummer Davis," read "Drummer David Dickson."

Order books to be corrected accordingly.

By order of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief,

J. R. LUMLEY, Major General,
Adjutant General of the Army.

A VERY BEAUTIFUL ASTRONOMICAL TIME PIECE,
BY SHEARER, OF LONDON.

Who made the first of the kind for H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex.

THE above TIME PIECE is of the most elegant construction, and is so fitted with a glass case to a handsome stand, that every part of the mechanism is distinctly seen. There are two sets of dials, the one shewing mean solar time, and the other sidereal time. Connected with the Clock work are two Globes of six inches diameter; of which the Terrestrial performs a revolution in a mean solar day, so as to exhibit the various places on the Earth's surface, as they are presented to the Sun, the position of which is represented by the meridian circle: whilst the Celestial performs a revolution in a sidereal day, so as to exhibit the stars in the position in which they are in the heavens, at any hour of the day or night. There is lastly a circle placed horizontally, which revolves once a year, so as to shew the day of the month correctly.

The mechanism of the Time Piece, both in design and execution, is of the first order: and to prevent its being injured by the removal of the glass shade, there is an apparatus for winding up the works from the outside, which is entirely detached from the movement except when in the act of winding.

The Time Piece may be seen at Mr. E. Grey's, Hare Street, Calcutta.

Lord Ellenborough's Uncle.—A correspondent of the Delhi Gazette has hinted that Lord Ellenborough's Uncle was dismissed the Company's Civil Service for corrupt practices. Our impression, says the Star, is that the imputation is unfounded. And we may add that the same doubt exists on our minds. We think the allusion made is to Mr. Thomas Law, the sixth son of the Bishop of Carlisle, and a brother of the first Lord Ellenborough. He was for some years Collector of Behar, and to him the temple of Gya was indebted for those arrangements which facilitated the resort of pilgrims to the shrine. But he is chiefly known in India as the individual who in one day settled eight hundred estates,—we may be wrong in the number, as we depend on memory—upon a Mocurreree or fixed jumma. They are generally known as 'Law's Mocurrerees' and have been a source of constant vexation to the public authorities ever since. It is very probable that he incurred the displeasure and the censure of Government for this hasty and ill advised measure; but as he was subsequently raised to the post of member of the Council of Revenue, it is scarcely to be supposed that he was ignominiously dismissed the service. He took a very deep interest in the prosperity of the country, as his "Sketch of some late arrangements, and a View of the rising resources of Bengal," a work now before us, fully attests. In 1791 sickness compelled him to return to England, and we suppose that he soon after entered Parliament, for we find him on his legs on the 20th of June 1794, when Mr. Pitt moved the thanks of the House to the Managers for their faithful management in discharge of the trust reposed in them. The report of Mr. Law's speech is somewhat amusing.

"There was now in the House of Commons a rough Northumbrian, of the Honourable Company's service, who had passed some years in India—a Mr. Law, brother to Hastings's counsel, the to be Lord Ellenborough. As if to prove that a bad temper and a rough tongue were not peculiar to one member of his family, this Mr. Law delivered a speech against the coarseness of Burke, in language more coarse and vulgar than any that had been heard for a long time in that place. With a bungling allusion to Burke's early but exquisite essay on the Sublime and Beautiful, this mannerless Law said, "If any passage in his speech could be called sublime and beautiful, it was, at the best, but sublime and beautiful nonsense; and at other times his expressions were so vulgar and illiberal, that the lowest blackguard in a bear-garden would have been ashamed to utter them." He professed to be astonished that a gentleman like Fox "should condescend to mix his character with that of the leading manager, whose follies and intemperance he had vainly endeavoured to correct." "And as for his information," added Law, "I am really astonished that a man who has been twenty-two years employed in Indian inquiries should still be so very ignorant of India."

Perhaps some of our readers may be able to throw more light on the subject. We should not omit to mention that there was another uncle of Lord Ellenborough's, who we conjecture, was also in the Civil Service in India. Ewan Law, the second son of the Bishop of Carlisle, married a daughter of Dr. Markham, Archbishop of Canterbury. A son of the Archbishop was in India during Mr. Hastings's administration—we believe at Lucknow,—and amassed a splendid fortune. His father, the Archbishop, on hearing Mr. Burke's examination of Mr. Auriol, another of the Indian sons of fortune, "in a very unbecoming violence of language and gesture told Burke, that he examined the witness as if he were examining not a gentleman but a pickpocket, and that the illiberality and inhumanity of the Managers could not have been exceeded by Marat or Robespierre." To this outbreak, Burke replied with much dignity, "I have not heard one word which has been spoken, and I shall act as if I had not." We find the name of Ewan Law in the list of thirty-seven Civilians, who were stated by Major Scott Waring in his place in the House of Commons to have returned to England with fortunes in the twenty-two years preceding 1784. It appears highly probable therefore that it was Mr. Ewan Law of the Civil Service to whom the sister of Mr. Markham of the same service, was married. We leave it to those who have been more successful in their researches than we have, to determine to which of the two brothers, the historian alludes when he speaks of the rough Northumbrian who had now, that is in 1794, got into Parliament.

The Education Bill.—The opposition which has been made to Sir James Graham's compulsory Education Bill by all parties in England who are not members of the Established Church, has constrained him to offer a modification of it. As the subject does not appear to be adequately understood in this country, though it has excited intense interest throughout England, we would take this opportunity of stating, that after the philanthropic Lord Ashley had brought forward his motion in March last relative to the brutal ignorance apparent in the manufacturing districts of England, which produced so powerful an impression on the public mind, Sir James Graham introduced a Bill for regulating labour in Factories, and imparting instruction to the children employed in them. This Bill for the first time provided for the compulsory attendance of children at School, and for the support of Schools by taxes levied by Act of Parliament. At the same time he declared it to be his intention gradually to extend its provisions to other parts of the country, and in fact to make it the basis of a system of national education. The two main features of the Bill were, first the necessity which it imposed on all parents to send their children to these Schools by providing that no child should be employed in any factory who did not produce a certificate from the master; and, secondly, the preponderating influence which it gave to the established Church in the system about to be established. The Bill, which was understood to have been drawn up under the direction of that eminent Puseyite, Dr. Hook of Leeds, and of a high Tory Factory Inspector, was supposed to aim a deadly blow at Dissent, by entrusting the education of the country to an Establishment becoming daily more exclusive and intolerant by the infusion of Tractarian principles. We cannot better describe the specific objections of the Dissenters to the obnoxious clauses of the proposed law, than by quoting the following synopsis of them by Mr. Baynes.

'1st. The bill, for the first time, enacts that schools shall be built and supported, where any of the great manufactures are carried on, partly out of the poor's-rate. Two-thirds of the sum required for building a school may be advanced out of public money—viz. one-third from the Parliamentary grant through the Committee of Council, and one-third out of the poor's-rate. Whatever deficiency may exist in the means for the annual support of the school is also to be paid out of the poor's-rate.

'2nd. The rate-payers are not, directly or indirectly, to have any species of control or influence over the schools, nor any check upon the expenditure.

'3rd. The bill not only for the first time authorizes the building and maintenance of schools out of the poor's-rate, but it also for the first time places schools, thus paid for out of the public money, under the control and management of the clergy of the established church, and with such provisions as would make them exclusively church schools.

'4th. The bill provides no assistance whatever for any other class of schools.

'5th. It actually forbids the employment of a child in any manufacture who does not attend one of these church schools,—except only that children may attend a National school, a British and foreign school, or a school within the factory where they work, but only after those schools shall have been reported by an inspector of schools to be 'efficiently conducted' (of which he is the sole judge;) and it gives no pecuniary aid to such schools.

'6th. It makes it unlawful for factory children to attend any Wesleyan, Independent, Baptist, or other denominational day-school.

'7th. It enforces the attendance of the children at the church schools, by penalties both on the mill-owner and on the parents, unless there should be a National, or British school in the district, or a school within the factory.

'8th. The schools to be built and supported out of the poor's-rates are to be under the management of seven trustees; of whom the only permanent one is to be the clergyman of the parish,—two others are to be churchwardens, chosen (when there is a greater number of churchwardens than two) by the clergyman,—and the remaining four to be annually appointed by the justices for the place or division.

'9th. The clerical trustee is to be the permanent chairman of the trustees,—to have a casting voice,—to have the sole and exclusive superintendence of the religious instruction,—to direct the master as to the religious instruction to be given,—to have the exclusive selection of the religious books to be used,—to instruct, catechise, and examine the children in the principles of their religion,—and in all this to be perfectly IRRESPONSIBLE,—the inspector of schools being expressly forbid even to inquire into the religious instruction given, to examine the scholars upon it, or to make any report thereon, unless he receive authority for that purpose from the archbishop or bishop.

'10th. The master and his assistants are to be appointed by the bishop.

'11th. The schools are to be Sunday-schools as well as day-schools; and the scholars are to attend the established church once every Sunday; but with the following exceptions—namely, that a child may be exempted from receiving religious instruction in the day-school, from attending the school on the Sunday, and from attending the church, if 'the parent shall notify to the master, that, on the ground of religious objection, he desires such scholar not to attend the worship of the church of England,' or to receive religious instruction on week days, or to attend the church school on Sunday.

'12th. The church catechism and such portions of the liturgy as the clergyman may select, may be taught for one hour, out of three, every morning and every afternoon, except to the children whose parents shall object.

'13th. A millowner having a school within his own premises, is obliged to have the church catechism and liturgy taught there to any child being 'a member of the church of England.'—pp. 4—6.

As soon as the character of the Bill became known, the spirit of the country was roused. All party differences were merged in a common opposition to a Bill which entrusted such extraordinary power to ministers of the Established Church. The powerful body of the Wesleyans, which had hitherto kept aloof from the Dissenters, had been driven into their arms by the insolence of the Tractarians: and they threw the whole weight of their influence into the scale. Even the Roman Catholics, with whom the Tractarians had been coquetting, took the alarm, and felt it necessary to defend their liberties against this new encroachment. The Bill threatened the existence of the Sunday Schools which have been the instrument of incalculable good to England; and those peaceful associations were constrained to petition the Legislature against this hostile measure. The Church looked on, in some instances with complacency, in others with approbation, though there were not wanting men who lamented that the Bill did not go far enough, and who objected to the unceremonious manner in which the Ministry proposed to employ Clerical agency in working out its own ends, as though the Church was the passive instrument of the state. But the more satisfaction the Bill gave to Churchmen, the more umbrage did it naturally give to Dissenters.

Parliament reassembled after the Easter recess on Monday, the 24th of April, and the first business of the night was the presentation of between two and three hundred petitions against the Educational clauses of the Bill. On Tuesday the number of petitions against it amounted to between four and five hundred. On Wednesday, between three and four hundred more were presented. On that evening Sir James Graham, acknowledged that he had incurred no small share of obloquy by venturing to bring forward this Education Bill, and announced his intention of making certain amendments of importance in its provisions, on the succeeding Monday, the 1st of May. On Thursday a great number of petitions were again presented against the Bill, and one in its favour from Manchester. On Friday three petitions were presented in favour of the Bill by Col. Sibthorpe and two others, and three thousand one hundred and thirty-six against it. The scene presented on this occasion in the House and the lobby was not a little amusing. The lobby was crowded with gentlemen having charge of large bales of petitions, regularly labelled according to the districts from which they came. They were either waiting for, or in search of members to present them. Multitudes of similar petitions had been transmitted from the country to the Representatives, and were brought down by them either in their own carriages or in hired cabs. Members were seen entering the house bearing porter's loads of petitions, or sitting with piles at their feet, waiting for their turn to present them.

On Monday, the 1st of May, two waggon loads of petitions on the part of the Wesleyans drove up to the doors of Parliament, and the number presented on this day, was five petitions in favour of the Bill, and five thousand against it. Up to Wednesday, the 3d May, the petitions begging for the withdrawal of the Educational clauses of the Bill amounted to ELEVEN THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND FORTY-FOUR. The modifications of the Bill proposed by Sir James Graham do not appear to have improved its character, as they leave precisely the same predominating influence in the hands of the clergy over the system of national education, which was found so objectionable in the first Bill. The Standard, with the view of reconciling Churchmen to the alterations, says, that "the changes are but trifling, changes in form, and scarcely at all changes in substance." Yet it is deemed extraordinary that the Dissenters who were repugnant to the first Bill, have not cordially welcomed the amended Bill! As far as we have been able to gather from the papers published between the 1st and 6th May, the amendments are generally unsatisfactory; and those who have petitioned the house against the original Bill will probably petition with greater force, and if possible in greater numbers against its amendments, and demand its entire abrogation. The Bill in its amended form was to be taken into consideration on the 22d May, when we may expect it to be consigned to the tomb of the Capulets. Sir R. Peel, who was not present when Sir James Graham's amendments were brought forward, had previously declared that he would not be satisfied with a mere Parliamentary Majority; and that he would not carry the measure through, unless he could carry the country with him. That is now utterly hopeless. The overwhelming torrent of petitions against this measure, which is altogether without example, has modified the tone even of the Tory Times and Post. This latter paper now denounces the Bill in very explicit terms: "We think Her Majesty's Ministers have hit upon as likely a method of engendering strife upon the great matter of Christian education, as any that could have been devised;" and it predicts that as a practical measure, it must, even if forced through Parliament, altogether fail. The Times designates it as little less than "a tyrannical attempt to force Church doctrines, or at least Church influences down the throats of Dissenters by Act of Parliament."

THE JOURNAL OF THE ASIATIC SOCIETY.—We are happy to find that the Asiatic Society has at length adopted this Journal as its own. For several years past the Society has been in that position which is usually called 'anomalous.' The enterprising James Prinsep, the Secretary of the Society, some years back was induced, from his love of Science, to issue a small and unpretending, but not the less valuable periodical publication, entitled Gleanings of Science, as a repository for the contributions which he received from his scientific friends. It was subsequently enlarged, and its title changed to that of the Journal of the Asiatic Society; but its pecuniary and literary responsibilities rested with the Editor. The subscriptions were not at first equal to the expense of bringing it through the press, but the indefatigable industry of Mr. Prinsep, combined with his extraordinary attainments, at length secured sufficient support to relieve him from loss, and gave the Journal a high European reputation. But as it was not the accredited organ of the Society it appeared under many disadvantages, and the Society itself suffered from the diversion of all papers of interest to this Journal, to such an extent as to leave no materials for the compilation of a volume of its Researches. On the death of Mr. Prinsep, Mr. Sutherland and Dr. O'Shaughnessy became joint Secretaries of the Society, and proprietors and Editors of the Journal. On their resignation, Mr. Torrens was voted Secretary, and the proprietary right and management of the Journal devolved on him. Last year he felt himself constrained, partly from the pressure of official duties, and partly from the loss of that elasticity of mind to which men are exposed in all climates, and more especially in the East, when overburdened with engagements, to relinquish his connection with the Society and the Journal. The Society however soon after invited him to resume his office of Secretary, and agreed to adopt the Journal as its own publication.

Such a step indeed could no longer be deferred without serious injury to the interests of the Society. The Journal and the Researches could not co-exist. Contributors, with the choice of sending their papers for publication in a volume which appeared after the interval of several years, or in a periodical journal which appeared every month, were sure to prefer the latter. As Mr. Torrens justly observes, the Journal had absorbed the Researches. We have therefore lost the Researches, the royal quarto, with its magnificent amplitude of margin, the last memento of the patrician origin of the Society, and in its stead we have all the contributions to the Society embodied in a Journal, issued monthly, in an octavo size, in conformity with the utilitarian practise of the times. The change is in every respect to be commended. The monthly Journal will now be exchanged on the part of the Society with the Transactions of other learned Associations in Europe and America; and an additional stimulant will be given to those who conduct it to render it worthy of the high reputation of the body whose researches it embodies. At the same time, the personal labour of the Secretary will be lightened by the assistance he will obtain from the Committee of Papers, and he will enjoy more leisure for keeping up an interest in the labours of the Society by correspondence with other and kindred bodies abroad. The first number of the new Series, is filled exclusively with papers relative to the newly conquered province of Scinde. The information they afford is very valuable,—only we fear the literati of Europe will be led to suspect that the choice of the subject is intended as a compliment to the nobleman who has made Scinde a province of the British empire in the East.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY CONTROVERSY REGARDING THE NAME OF JESUS.—We are constrained by the rules of equity, to publish two letters containing remarks on the article which appeared on this subject a fortnight ago in our columns. Before we proceed to notice them however, we would conciliate our readers by the assurance that this is the last time of noticing the controversy.

The letter of a Mofussil Missionary, is on the same side of the argument with ourselves; and we need therefore only recommend it to the reader for its clear statements and close reasoning. The letter of J. H. takes the opposite side, and we publish it with unfeigned pleasure. The tone of Christian moderation which it breathes, so different from that of our former correspondent, gives good reason to hope that if he has any influence in the councils of the Society, the threatened schism may be avoided.

Nothing can be farther from our intention than to revive the discussion concerning the word baptize. We have quite enough to do with the name of Jesus. We alluded to it in our last article from a feeling of necessity. It was the taunts of the "Member of the Society" which constrained us to bring it forward, in order to shew that our views on the present occasion were not jaundiced by it. Of the justice of that measure our opinion remains unaltered. We still think it was an instance of more than ordinary infirmity in the British and Foreign Bible Society, to cast off associates of more than thirty year's standing, because they would not give up the use of a word which the Society itself had deemed innocent during that long period. We still think that it betrayed inconsistency in the Society, to insist on conditions in the East which they had not the courage to moot in the West; and to demand uniformity in Asia at a time when they were allowing every diversity of usage in Europe. But the separation is a fact; it is no longer an open question. In a practical point of view, indeed, we consider the result of that controversy auspicious. It is more advantageous for the Baptist Missions in the East, that they should enjoy independent sources of supply for the printing and circulation of the Scriptures, which will flow spontaneously and cheerfully, than still continue dependent on aid which would have been given with a feeling of reluctance, in a tone of condescension, and in a measure totally inadequate to the wants of the Missionaries.

Our opponent says, that we urge it as a matter of indifference how the name is written; and that if he could be satisfied of this, he would place a motion on the table of the Committee for rescinding the resolution. Now every Mahomedan recognizes in the name Isa, the Saviour, whom Christians adore as God; and the change of this name for Yusua can of itself carry no conviction to his mind of the divinity of Christ. The mode of spelling the name is on this ground a matter of indifference. But if the proposed change tends to confuse his ideas, and leads him to suppose that the terms refer to different characters, it may be productive of mischief, and will cease to be a matter of indifference. We were therefore perhaps somewhat indiscreet in treating it as an indifferent question; since it is a matter of no small importance that the orthography of our Saviour's name, which has been in vogue for 1200 years in the Mahomedan community, should not be altered. The importance of using a name which has a specific signification, and which on being pronounced shall of itself convey the idea of a distinct office, has ceased with the loss of the original language. Ninety-nine Mahomedans, out of every hundred in India at the present time, are as incapable of perceiving the intimation of a Saviour in Yusua, as in Isa; and the adoption of the former term is therefore without advantage. And unless the benefit arising from the use of this term be great, and undeniable, the disadvantage of unsettling, by any change, the ideas of those who are addressed by the Missionaries, must be considered as decisive against it.

"When it is stated," observes our correspondent, "that the angel said to Joseph "Thou shalt call his name Isa," "I deny that he ever said any such thing. Can the denial be disproved?" If the denial cannot be disproved, no more can it be disproved, that when the Evangelist wrote in Greek, "Kalessis to onoma autou Jesoun,"* he departed as far from the Hebrew spelling, as an Oordoo translator will by using the term Isa. There cannot be much harm in misspelling after the example of an inspired penman.

The resolution of the Bible Society amounts to this, that they will not assist in the printing or circulation of any copy of the New Testament, in which the word Jesus is spelt differently from the mode in which the angel pronounced it. Upon this principle, they cannot conscientiously circulate the English version; for it is clear that the angel did not pronounce the name of our Saviour, Jesus. Neither can they circulate half the versions printed by the Bible Society at home, in the various languages of the world; for in how many of them is the name written Yusua? Neither can they ever assist in giving the Gospel to the Chinese, for their monosyllabic language admits only of a very distant approximation to the term which the Society consider to be alone orthodox.

Our correspondent objects to the strong language we used when we said that "we felt constrained to raise our feeble but earnest protest against the folly, we had almost said the guilt, of making the spelling of a word of five syllables a new Shibboleth of party." With his example before us, we cheerfully recall the words; we recal every expression throughout the article which can give pain to those whose practice we oppose. We will adopt only the language of entreaty, and close this controversy, so far as our columns are concerned, by entreating the members of the Society anew to consider whether it is worth while to alienate from their connection the devoted Missionaries in the North West Provinces, by insisting upon the adoption of a particular mode of spelling the name Jesus, to which they have a strong practical objection; whether it is worth while to interrupt the progress of divine truth in the smallest degree, by insisting upon a rule, in reference to one version, which they cannot insist upon in reference to all. We ask them seriously to consider, whether that diversity in the spelling of the name Jesus, which is found to do no harm in other countries, is after all of such unequivocal detriment in India, in the case of a single version, that it must be corrected even at the risk of a new schism.

LADY SALE'S JOURNAL OF THE DISASTERS IN AFFGHANISTAN IN 1841-1842.—We have just completed the second perusal of Lady Sale's interesting Journal. It is valuable as a record of transactions of the deepest and most painful interest; and its value is increased in no ordinary degree by the peculiar form in which it is given, and by the assurance, we feel that it was penned, from day to day, as events transpired, and that her Ladyship has in no instance been obliged to draw on her recollections. The entire loss of all papers and documents, private or public, in the disastrous retreat, serves also to give peculiar importance to the only record which escaped the general wreck. Lady Sale informs us that immediately before leaving the cantonment she bound the little volume of her notes round her waste, and was thus enabled to preserve it from destruction. The Journal itself occasionally appears heavy from the repetition of trivial circumstances; but even these are not without their value, in as much as they give us a picture of the time, and describe the feelings and views of those who were in the camp. In the first part of the volume, embracing the events of the two months which elapsed between the outbreak and the catastrophe, we have almost as many rumours recorded as facts; but they are so clearly distinguished from each other, as to enable us satisfactorily to separate the chaff from the wheat. The character of the work is desultory, but this was inseparable from the mode in which it was compiled. Though not a History of the disastrous campaign, it furnishes abundant and valuable materials for the future historian. The style is lively and vigorous. This is no attempt at fine writing. It is the plain unvarnished narrative of a soldier's wife, who records with freedom her own impressions of the extraordinary events passing around her. If the work had been other than it is in point of style, arrangement or pretensions, we should have been disappointed.

Lady Sale has been censured for the freedom with which she has spoken of the conduct of some of the chief actors in that disastrous campaign. Some of her reviewers have gone so far as to say that her observations are not only indiscreet, but malicious. We have been astonished to find how entirely this idea has been dispelled by a perusal of the book, which appears to us to be remarkable for nothing so much as for the moderation of its censures. When we bear in mind that in no instance in our national annals has so large a force been so entirely annihilated,—and that by an enemy whom at all other times we have invariably beaten;—that the military errors of that campaign, the vacillation, the indecision, the cowardly submission to calamity, are altogether unparalleled, we are surprised at the singular temperance of feeling with which the book is compiled. Lady Sale is, it is true, particularly severe upon Brigadier Shelton, who resisted every effort to extricate the army from its toils, by bold and energetic exertions; who croaked about a retreat from the first; who, knowing the General's weakness of body and mind, refused to take the lead in saving the army; who was ever anxious to shift responsibility from himself; and who brought his quilt to the Military Council, and dozed while the discussions proceeded. But who of all the survivors of that slaughter does not believe that if another man had been second in command, instead of Brigadier Shelton, that army would in all human probability have been saved? But Lady Sale does ample justice to his personal bravery, to his chivalrous bearing in actual danger; and to the attachment of his men, who were so charmed with his contempt of danger, as to forget all they had suffered from his dreadful severity. Lady Sale in her remarks on Shelton, only echoes the general voice of the army. It is for him to come forward and rescue his name from that everlasting infamy to which it will otherwise be inevitably consigned by the future historian. The only other persons of whom she speaks with disparagement,—and that but once or twice—are Capts. Grant and Bellew, and the croaking Col. Oliver. She does indeed on one occasion censure an arrangement of Pottinger's, and laughs at the Military Board for having sent six nine-pounders instead of three eighteens, as though two small guns would send a ball as far as one long one; but these are, we think, the only instances in which she has alluded with severity to the officers in a campaign which presented so large field for censure. She could scarcely have said less of the blunders which ended so fatally, and we have felt throughout the perusal of the work, that she has placed her feelings of just indignation under a wise and salutary restraint.

We now proceed to notice those facts in Lady Sale's Journal, which throw additional light upon the disasters of the campaign, as well as those which corroborate the previous statements we had obtained from Lieuts. Eyre and Melville. And here we may mention generally that her narrative not only bears out their assertions to the fullest extent, but that in various minute details there is often so close a correspondence, as to lead to the supposition that she must have had the benefit of their materials. It is possible that Lady Sale may have depended on Lieut. Melville's report for the detail of some of the events which transpired in the Bala Hissar; but in every other respect her observations appear to have been noted down from day to day, and they bear the undoubted stamp of originality.

Lady Sale reconciles the contradictory reports which were in vogue respecting Sir William Macnaghten's demand for troops and his assertion that they were not necessary. We are told that two months before the out-break, he wrote to Government for five additional Regiments, of which two were to be European; that a written war succeeded between the Envoy and Government; and that letter after letter came calling for retrenchment; that it was Lord Auckland's sovereign will and pleasure that 'tranquillity do reign in Affghanistan;' and that it was reported at Government House that the lawless Affghans were as peaceable as London citizens. Sir William, at length became willing to persuade himself that the country was tranquil, and acceded to the entreaties of Burnes—who was blinded on the subject—and wrote to Lord Auckland withdrawing his former request for additional troops, and saying that some of the regiments now in the country might be spared. There can be little doubt that Lord Auckland was anxious to believe that the country was as peaceful as Lord Palmerstone had represented it to be, when he contrasted it with Algeria, and it is easy to suppose that Sir William should be anxious to indulge the same pleasing idea; but Sir Alexander Burnes's infatuation appears incredible, more especially after the distinct warning he had received from Capt. Gray.

The general cause of the rebellion, as stated by Lady Sale, tallies with every previous account. "In former times, under the feudal system, when the sovereign of Cabul required troops, each bold chieftain came forward with his retainers; but these vassals had been taken from them, and were embodied in corps commanded by British officers, to whom they owed no affection, and only paid a forced obedience; the chief's power was now greatly limited,"—and he was anxious to shake off this foreign yoke. The fanaticism of the lower orders had been raised to the highest pitch by the preaching of the Mollas, who were anxious to rid the country of the Kaffirs. But the immediate cause of the rebellion was the injudicious reduction of the allowances granted to the Chiefs. Of this however Lady Sale gives a different version, which places the folly of the act in a more conspicuous light. The Forty thousand Rupees for which we risked the loss of a country which had cost us two thousand times that sum, did not consist of money to be actually paid from our coffers; but of reductions allowed in the tribute of the chiefs, for advantages withheld from them. The chiefs were reasoned with on the necessity of this measure of economy; they declared their perfect satisfaction at the arrangement, and then took to the road with their followers,—and the first scene of this tragic drama was opened.

The rebellion broke out on the morning of the 2d. The city was in commotion; the shops were plundered and a body of men, not exceeding three hundred, murdered Sir A. Burnes, his brother, and Lieut. Broadfoot. This appears to have occurred about eight in the morning, for the rumour of his death was in the cantonment at nine. Capt. Trevor's house and tower, and Capt. Mackenzie's fort, which were in the vicinity of this sanguinary scene, were not more than a mile and a quarter from the cantonment, with few if any intermediate interruptions. Had a Regiment with a small detail of Cavalry and Artillery marched instantly to the spot, not only might those posts have been defended and the supplies they contained have been preserved, but the rebellion itself would have been nipped in the bud; for Captains Trevor and Mackenzie, with only a handfull of troops, were able to hold out for three days after the attack begun. Such a demonstration of vigor, on the first day of the outbreak would at once have turned the scale in our favour. We are told by Lady Sale that on the morning of the 2d, a number of chiefs, Osman Khan, Abdul Ruhim Khan, Khan Shereen Khan, the head of the Kuzilbashes, Taj Mahomed Khan, and others went to lend Capt. Trevor assistance, and Zeman Khan sent his son as a hostage. The smallest exertion of vigor and energy,—one hour of the Duke—would have crushed the rebellion; but the General was bewildered. Sir William rode to the gate of the cantonments and back again, and within two hours removed from his house in the Mission compound into cantonments, a circumstance which could scarcely fail to be interpreted as an indication of mistrust, if not of fear.

Though the rebellion was allowed to gather strength during the 2d, 3d and 4th of November, it might have been subsequently kept down, if the troops in cantonments had been as well supplied with provisions as they were with ammunition. It was the loss of the Commissariat Fort, which compromized its safety, and which became the fruitful cause of every subsequent calamity. All parties are agreed that we were starved out of the country. The events of the night—the 4th November—when Lieut. Warren was defending that Fort against fearful odds, and the General was deliberating about his relief, possess a peculiar interest; and it is important to determine upon whose shoulders the blame of that fatal indecision rests which led to the loss of our supplies and placed us at the mercy of our enemies. Lady Sale agrees with Lieut. Eyre in representing that General Elphinstone, on receiving a letter from Warren, pressing for a reinforcement, ordered him to evacuate the Fort, and abandon the provisions; that Captains Grant and Bellew represented to the General the infinite importance of preserving the supplies, and the ruin which must follow the loss of them; that the General thereupon determined to take Sheriff's Fort, which commanded the Commissariat Fort, that night; that he ordered troops to be in readiness for that purpose; then vacillated, and at length did nothing; and the stores fell into the hands of the enemy, and starvation stared the British troops in the face. The General, who had no mind of his own, was evidently led to this fatal inaction, at the very crisis of our fate, by the advice of others. On this subject Lady Sale and Lieut. Eyre are at variance. The latter says, he was sent to consult Lieut. Sturt on the night of the 4th, who "at first expressed himself in favour of an immediate attack, but on hearing that some of the enemy were on the watch at the gate, judged it prudent to defer the assault till an early hour in the morning; and that this decided the General, though not before several hours had slipped away in fruitless discussion." From this statement it would appear as though Lieut. Sturt's advice determined the General to delay till it was too late to act—Lady Sale's account is different. "About 10 o'clock in the evening, Lieut. Eyre, Deputy Commissary of Ordnance, and Capt. Warburton came to Sturt, and as they had received information that there were men posted outside the Fort with matchlocks all ready, the plan in agitation of blowing open the gate with a bag of powder would not answer; they therefore, with Sturt, determined on getting the two nine-pounders into the bastion, and on setting to work forthwith to cut the embrasures to fit them; and between two and three in the morning was fixed upon as the time to throw in a proportion of shells to create confusion. The place is to be taken by assault. If this does not succeed, we shall have to retreat to Jellalabad." The Commissariat fort was not lost before morning had well dawned—between six and seven we suppose. There was therefore ample time for the successful accomplishment of the object, on the plan which Eyre, Sturt and Warburton had agreed on, and it does not therefore appear clear that the fort was lost through the General's following Capt. Sturt's advice.

It will be remembered, that no little surprise was excited by an indistinct rumour which reached Calcutta from Cabul while the troops were besieged, that Lieut. Sturt was directing every movement in the cantonment, though obliged to move about in his shirt and trowsers, owing to his unhealed wounds. Lady Sale explains the circumstance by recording on the 8th of November, "that there was a report that we were to be attacked in cantonments to-night. Sturt went to General Elphinstone and Brigadier Anquetil, who both gave him carte blanche and desired that all his instructions should be obeyed. He has accordingly placed 15 guns in position." His carte blanche does not appear to have extended beyond the period of that night's panic; though there can be little doubt that on subsequent occasions the influence of his strong mind must have made itself felt among the weak and vacillating minds of the Commanders. But in one respect his advice was not taken. On the third day of the insurrection he strongly recommended that the troops should be removed to the Bala Hissar. That advice was repeated at successive periods, at each of which its propriety, and eventually its necessity, had been demonstrated by fresh disasters. Lieut. Eyre and Lieut. Melville concur with Lady Sale in stating that this was the plan which ought to have been adopted. The Envoy continued to maintain the same opinion, till it was too late to adopt the measure. Lady Sale says, that "Sturt advised that ammunition should be nightly sent thither, and when a sufficiency was conveyed, they might all make one bold night march in very light marching order. There we might be lodged (not comfortably I grant) in the houses of the inhabitants, who would be well paid for vacating them. They have laid in their stores for the winter which would be bought at any price—and then we might defy all Affghanistan for any time." Once in the Bala Hissar, the army would have been in a great measure master of its own movements, and might have taken advantage of the favourable turn of circumstances which a knowledge of its impregnable position, must have created among its enemies. It is deeply to be deplored that Sir W. Macnaghten did not insist on this movement as soon as the Commissariat stores were irretrievably lost, and it became evident that the movements of the troops during the winter must be entirely defensive. This step became almost imperative when the disposition of the Commanders in such an emergency became apparent. When it was discovered that neither General Elphinstone nor Brigadier Shelton would support any active measures for the relief of the troops, it became the dictate of common sense, to occupy the most advantageous post for defensive warfare, and to place the army in a position in which their vacillation and torpidity could do least harm. Had Sir William taken this decisive measure on his own responsibility, however he might have risked public censure, he would have shewn himself equal to the great crisis of the time.

Lady Sale's account of the engagement of the 13th November on the Beymaroo Hill, when the troops were sent out to capture the two guns which the enemy had brought up to play upon the cantonments, tallies very closely with that given by Lieut. Eyre. It was with great difficulty the Envoy prevailed on the General and Brigadier to consent to the despatch of the force. It was with difficulty the troops could be kept to their duty. "All was regular confusion; my very heart felt as if it leapt to my teeth, when I saw the Affghans ride clean through them. The onset was fearful. They looked like a cluster of bees; but we beat them and drove them up again."—"When the men of the 37th were upbraided for turning, they replied, we only retreated when we saw the Europeans run, and knew we should not be supported."

Lady Sale's description of the events of the fatal day of Beymaroo, the 23d November, is very graphic. Her Ladyship took her post of observation, like Rebecca in Ivanhoe, on the top of the house, whence she had a fine view of the field of action and where, by keeping behind the chimneys, she was enabled to escape the bullets that continually whizzed by her. The events of that day were preceded by "great dissensions in the military councils. High and very plain language had been used by Brigadier Shelton to General Elphinstone; and people did not hesitate to say that he should be set aside; a mode of proceeding recommended a fortnight before by Mr. Baness, the merchant." Lady Sale notices the same military faults as Lieut. Eyre; the most fatal of which was the having taken but one gun. She says that the Brigadier, when he approached the village before dawn, and it was found to contain few defenders, was entreated to storm it, and refused. The number of the enemy afterwards increased rapidly to 10,000. The fight continued till 10 A. M. by which time our killed and wounded had been greatly increased. The vent of the gun became too hot for the artillery men to use it. At about half past 9 a party of Ghazees ascended the brow of the hill. They planted three standards. When they fairly appeared above ground, it was evident our men were not inclined to meet them. Every field glass in the cantonment was pointed to the hill with intense anxiety. The officers were seen to urge on the troops; the most conspicuous were Mackintosh, Laing, Troup, Mackenzie, and Layton; to encourage the men they pelted the fanatics with stones; the fanatics returned the assault with the same weapons—but nothing could inspirit our soldiers; they would not advance though the enemy did not appear to exceed 150; a Ghazee rushed forward, sword in hand, to defy the cowards; a sepoy of the 37th darted forth and met him with his bayonet. They both fell and rose again, but were eventually killed. The enemy rushed on and drove our men like a flock of sheep. They captured our gun. The artillery men fought like heroes; two were killed at the gun; Serjeant Mulhall received three wounds; poor Laing was shot while waving his sword over the gun and cheering his men. Our troops fled till they gained the second square which had not been broken; the fugitives here turned round and gave a shout, and the Ghazees, panic struck in their turn, abandoned the gun and made off. It was instantly re-opened on them. Sergeant Wade simultaneously made three splendid shots from the Kohistan gate of the cantonments, one of which struck the chief Abdoolla, and he fell. His people surrounded him and bore him off. The panic and flight became general and the enemy never stopped till they reached the city. In the city, the consternation was so great on hearing of Abdoolla's wound, that the women were sent away in great numbers, and many in such haste that they did not wait for their yaboos, but ran on foot expecting to see our troops in Cabul immediately.

The day was ours till 10 in the morning. Lady Sale says she heard the Envoy ask the General to pursue the flying troops to the city—which he refused, saying it was a wild scheme, and not feasible. She then returned home for breakfast, under the idea that all was over. Had Brigadier Shelton at that time retired into cantonments, or had he taken possession of the village, the day had continued ours; but he would do neither. The enemy, seeing we were not disposed to pursue them, took fresh courage. About half past 12 they gradually came up the hill; their fire was severe; our men dropped fast, and at length the whole force, horse and foot was driven down the hill and the gun captured. All order and discipline was at an end; each man fled for his life, in spite of the remonstrance and the example of the officers, and if Osman Khan had not restrained his Affgans, probably not one of those who left the cantonments that morning would have re-entered it.

The particulars given by Lieut. Eyre, relative to the subsequent negotiations, are fully corroborated by Lady Sale's Journal. There is however some little discrepancy in the report of Sir William's reply to the first proposals, but it only serves to confirm the conviction that the narratives are both original, and not derived from each other. Eyre says the Envoy replied, that "they should at all events meet at the day of judgement." Lady Sale's version of the reply is, that "that death was preferable to dishonour, and that we put our trust in the God of battles, and in his name bade them come on."

On the 27th Lady Sale notices that the Akoonzada, or old Mollah from Candahar, who was one of Sir William's few Native assistants and was to have accompanied him to Bombay, where he would have obtained wealth and honour, had just abandoned him and gone into the city. On the 30th, when the danger was more imminent, the Envoy and his Lady left the tent in which they had been living in the cantonments since the 2d of November, and went to live at the Residency. The apathy of the General in regard to the bridge which he allowed the enemy to break up without molestation, and the cowardice of one company of the 44th who fled from the captured fort, are fully confirmed in the Journal. Lady Sale adds that the other companies of that Regiment refused to associate with their dastardly comrades.

The state of peril to which the army was now reduced, so far from rousing the Commanders to action befitting their national and professional character, appears only to have increased their paralysis. "The General, unsettled in his purpose, delegates his power to the Brigadier, and the Brigadier tries to throw off all responsibility on the General's, or on any one else's shoulders." Both of them however, though they differed from each other on almost every measure, agreed in the necessity of treating instead of fighting. The events of the 8th and 9th December, which we noticed more particularly as bearing on the Envoy's letter of the latter date to Mr. Erskine, the publication of which Lord Ellenborough punished with a severity beyond the laws, are substantially the same in both narratives, only Lady Sale remarks that Brigadier Anquetil appended to his signature; "I concur in this opinion in a military point of view;" and she adds that though there were but three days' provisions left and Capt. Conolly offered to take the Ben-i-shehr, which was rich in grain, with the aid of the escort only, he was not permitted to do so. On the 16th December she records, "Our horses and cattle have neither grain, bhoosa nor grass. They have pretty well eaten up the bark of the trees and the tender branches; the horses gnaw the tent pegs. I was gravely told that the artillery horses had eaten the trunnion of a gun! This is difficult of belief; but I have seen my own riding horse, gnaw voraciously at a cart wheel. Nothing is satisfied with food except the Pariah dogs, who are gorged with eating dead camels and horses."

It was under these circumstances that Sir William Macnaghten entered upon negotiations with the rebels. The treaty which he concluded with them, he religiously observed in every particular. To that treaty it appears they never so much as affixed their signatures; its provisions they never observed; but daily rose in their demands, as if no treaty was in existence. It stipulated that ample supplies of provisions should be sent into cantonments;—one hundred and fifty maunds of attah only were sent, sufficient for one day's consumption. It provided that the means of transport for the baggage and stores should be furnished;—it does not appear that any carriage cattle were sent at all. Instead of giving us "certain men of consideration as hostages" according to the terms of the treaty, they demanded hostages of Sir William. They were given. Still no supplies of food, though the troops were starving. They then demanded the surrender of all the forts which commanded the cantonments: they were given up. They next insisted upon the delivery of our guns and ammunition. Sir William complied with this request also. After having thus deprived the unfortunate army of the means of resistance, without affording it the means of existence, they laid a deep plot for the ruin of the Envoy. They agreed that Akbar Khan should endeavour to treat separately with him, on the basis that no dependance could be placed on the other chiefs. Sir William, in a fatal moment of distraction, put his signature to the treaty; and the base and blood thirsty chiefs immediately exclaimed that he was no longer to be trusted! and the most faithless of the band shot him dead, and left his body to be hacked to pieces by the fanatics, and allowed its members to be exhibited in derision on the public buildings of Cabul!

This treaty has been made the occasion of heaping the foulest obloquy upon the memory of Sir William Macnaghten; and his conduct has been stigmatized as treacherous. Where is the treachery? He certainly was not bound by a reciprocal engagement of which one party had never observed the smallest item. The chiefs had solemnly engaged that they would amply supply his camp with provisions, and with the means of transport, and they left the troops exposed to all the rigor of a Cabul winter, and to starvation. There could be no doubt on the mind of the Envoy that it was their deliberate intention to cause the destruction of the troops, whom they had treacherously deprived of the means of resistance. In this extremity, one of their number offers terms of relief, and Sir William closes with him. Where is the smallest shadow of treachery in this step? We do not call to our aid the maxim that the law of self preservation is above every other obligation, though upon this ground alone Sir William would have been justified in adopting any arrangement which held out a hope of keeping fifteen thousand human beings from starvation; but we claim his exoneration from all censure in treating separately with Akbar Khan on the ground, that the treaty with the Chiefs had been rendered null and void, by their own conduct, and that it had long ceased to impose on Sir William any moral obligation to refrain from negotiating any other treaty.—In one respect however, we fear it will be impossible to exonerate the unfortunate Envoy from censure; we allude to that part of the engagement which embraced the capture of Ameenoollah. However great the provocation this man may have given, however base his treachery towards the English, Sir William ought on no consideration to have allowed himself to become a party to any plan for seizing him. With this exception, the treaty with Akbar Khan, which cost the Envoy his life, within twelve hours after it was signed, appears as entirely free from guilt as the most honourable treaty recorded in history.

Next week we shall notice the fatal retreat, availing ourselves of the three narratives now before us.

THE INDIAN REVIEW.—We take great blame to ourselves for not having hitherto noticed the Indian Review since it has passed from the management of Dr. Corbyn to that of Mr. Grant. We have now before us the Third Number of the New Series, which contains a faithful and valuable memoir of the Venerable Archdeacon Dealtry, to which is prefixed a portrait of him from the pencil of Mr. Grant,—one of his most successful efforts. This is succeeded by a continuation of Col. Pogson's Historical Researches, which are, we fear, too eccentric to obtain general favor. A full account of the Comet is then given, together with a view of its position in the heavens as seen on the 9th of March. This is succeeded by a pulpit sketch, of a minister in Calcutta, who is not a village Curate, but a Dignitary, but whether the sketch refers to the Bishop or the Archdeacon we are not told. It is written with vigor, and in a truly Christian spirit. Then comes a long letter from Dr. Duff with some remarks on the autobiography of the Revd. Krishna Mohun Banerjee, which we have not read, and are therefore unable to comprehend more of the controversy than that the convert's reasons for quitting the Presbyterians to join the Episcopalians, are not considered by Dr. Duff to be stated with sufficient chronological accuracy. The perusal of the letter strongly reminded us of the remark of the witty monarch who observed a century and a half ago, that Presbyterianism was not a religion for a gentleman. We have long leaned to the opinion that Brahmun converts would, in almost every instance, be found, sooner or later, to join the Established Church, and possibly manifest a greater partiality for those who advocate Tractarian prerogatives, than for those who are content with Evangelical privileges.—The rest of the number is composed of extracts judiciously selected. Without meaning the smallest disrespect to our former contemporary, Dr. Corbyn, we may still be permitted to say that the work has gained by the change of Editors; and we hope it will meet with that encouragement which it deserves.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 22.

— The Star has some speculations upon the probability of Lord Ellenborough's return home. His Lordship will of course throw up the Government as soon as the confidence of his own party slackens. They have had enough to do to defend his measures already; and if a great outcry be raised about Scinde and the Ministry are put to their shifts to defend this measure, they may intimate to His Lordship that they cannot spare any more time for the continual defence of his plans. Lord Ellenborough has spirit enough to relinquish his post the moment the Duke and Sir Robert are tired of him. There is this difference between the connection of the present and the late Governor General with the reigning Ministry; that whereas those measures of Lord Ellenborough which his friends have been required to defend, originated with him, the Affghan war originated as much in Downing Street as it did at Simlah. Indeed there is said to be evidence that the first idea of this war in Asia sprang from Lord Palmerston's indisposition to plunge into a European war in order to curb the ambition of Russia.

— We are happy to learn from the Star that the Assam Tea Company have obtained a remission of the Three Per Cent. export duty charged on their tea.

— The Bombay Times couples the burning of the Thomas Grenville, which was not accidental, with the burning of no fewer than five Bombay ships last year, which could not have been all accidental. The Editor affirms that this is the first of a series of vessels which have been already doomed. The offenders are in every case the crew, who having received six months advance, find it their interest to set the ship on fire and enjoy the money at home. Would it not be possible to establish a strict Registry office for Native seamen, and to make it a part of their engagement that the advance should be refunded if the ship was burnt. To secure a complete remedy nothing can certainly be wanting on the part of the merchants and commanders at Bombay, but a determination to put down the practise. An oriental apathy pervades all classes of society in India, which is most unfavourable to the removal of evils.

— Mr. Montriou, a Barrister of the Supreme Court, has been appointed to the vacant Magistracy. In accepting it he relinquishes all private practise; the gain in this case therefore is more on the side of the public than of the Barrister. The appointment has given general satisfaction. It is much to be wished that the allowances of the Magistrates and of the Commissioners of the Court of Requests in Calcutta could be raised to a greater equality with corresponding appointments held by the Covenanted. This would enable Government always to secure the services of gentlemen at the bar; which would be a most decided improvement.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23.

— A case of some importance has just been decided in the Court of the 24-Pergunnahs. Mr. Imhoff, who was attending the Court of Requests as plaintiff, was seized on coming out of it, by the Sheriff, on a writ issued from the 24-Pergunnahs. An application was made to the Judge for his release grounded upon two Constructions of the Sudder Court. The Judge said that it was only defendants and witnesses, who being compelled to attend the Court were exempted from arrest, eundo, morando et redeundo and refused the request; but he advised the petitioner to appeal from his order to the Sudder, whose decision would be final—whether satisfactory or not.

— The papers state that Mr. C. Tucker, now one of the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Court, has been appointed provisional member of Council, and will succeed on Mr. Bird's vacating his seat on the 14th of October. It was generally understood that the race lay between Mr. Tucker and Mr. Millett, the former of whom has the advantage over the latter of eleven years of additional service. Sir W. Casement's retirement in less than a year will create a second vacancy, which will probably fall to the lot either of Mr. George Clerk or Mr. Millett.

— The Hindoostan has thirty-five passengers already registered for the August trip. We hope the suggestions of the passengers will be listened to, and such alterations made in the accommodations as shall suit the climate. Four more trips are advertized for November, December, February and March. The December and March voyages are expected to be performed by the Bentinck, the twin of the Hindoostan, as she is called, though born a twelvemonth after her. The Bentinck is expected here in November.

— The Englishman states on the authority of a correspondent at Benares, that there were five persons locked up in an insane hospital, and that one of them strangled two of his companions.

— We publish the remarks of our three daily contemporaries on the question of Lottery advertisements. The Star has, we think, much the advantage of the others in weight of argument. The Hurkaru's observations are remarkable chiefly for their singular originality. He tells us that the advertisements are not published merely for the sake of profit—but in order that the paper may steer clear of inconsistency. We cannot see that to denounce the lotteries in one page and advertize them in another is to steer clear of inconsistency. As neither of our contemporaries appear to publish the advertisements for the sake of profit, that which we considered the main obstacle to the discontinuance of them, has ceased to exist.

SATURDAY, JUNE 24.

— The Hurkaru mentions 'a rumour, which has an aspect of credibility,' that the Tenasserim Steamer will be employed in conveying Mr. Bird and Sir W. Casement to Suez in October. The rumour is we think entirely without foundation. The accepsity for employing a Government Steamer in keeping up the direct monthly communication between Calcutta and Suez will diminish in the approaching cold season by the arrival of the Bentinck. The orders of the Court against the measure are understood to be absolute. Mr. Bird will be able to avail himself of the Hindoostan in November.

— We are happy to learn from the Star, that the quarantine between England and Egypt has been reduced from 21 days to 16. As the days employed in the voyage will be counted in the period of quarantine, there will be scarcely any detention in England, except when the Steamer reaches it in less than sixteen days. It is somewhat singular, that while such strict precautions are observed in reference to the voyage from Egypt to England, none should be deemed necessary relative to the voyage from Egypt to India.

— The Madras Athenæum states, that all the fifteen ships which left the roads at the commencement of the gale, have been accounted for.

— Lord Ellenborough has arrived at Allahabad on his way to Calcutta and taken up his residence with Mr. Matthews, a wealthy indigo planter.

— We are sorry to observe that the Bombay post office has this month been more dilatory than ever. It is now nine days since the Express arrived, and newspapers still continue to drop in one after the other.

MONDAY, JUNE 26.

— There was a grand Masonic procession of the brethren of the mystic tie, in all the habiliments of woe, on Saturday evening last, from Free Mason's Hall to the Cathedral, to hear the Archdeacon "improve" the death of the Duke of Sussex, the Grand Master of the Order, in an appropriate discourse. Mr. Dealtry took his text from the Second Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, chap. v. ver. 1. "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens."

— The Madras Athenæum states, that the Marquis of Tweeddale has rendered himself extremely unpopular by abolishing the indulgence hitherto enjoyed by the community of sending letters by the Express. This act will be as disadvantageous to Government as it is distressing to the merchants. The whole expense of the Express will now fall on the state; whereas under the previous arrangement the postage of private letters, fixed at a very high rate, not only relieved Government from all charge, but, when the wallet was full, left a small profit to the Post office.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that Omercote, in the desert on the eastern border of Scinde, has been made over to the adjoining state of Joudpore. In our hands it would only have been a source of expense. The same paper also states, that the well equipped Joudpore legion has been warned for service in Scinde; a very judicious measure as the men are less likely than other troops to suffer from the climate, which resembles their own.

— The Englishman states, that circulars have been issued at Barrackpore to join in a party to be given to the Governor General on his arrival at the station.

— One of the most benevolent actions of Lord Ellenborough, is the recent permission given by him to the disbanded men of the 4th Madras Cavalry to re-enlist. These men, by their insane attempt to resist Government in its determination on the batta question, forfeited all claim to consideration; but their deep contrition, combined with the recollection of their former good conduct, has induced his Lordship to overlook the ebullition of the moment and to permit them to enlist again under the British banner.

— We learn from the Delhi Gazette, that Mr. George Thompson was daily expected at Delhi, and that the Emperor had given orders for suitable arrangements to be made for his reception and accommodation.

TUESDAY, JUNE 27.

— The Star informs us that Lord Ellenborough has arranged to leave Allahabad by the 22d of the present month. As the river is now we suppose open, or may be expected to open in a day or two, his Lordship may probably be expected in Calcutta, early next month.

— At the last Opium sale, the drug fetched the same extraordinary price, which ruled at the preceding sale, and which is by no means justified by the last advices from China. The Patna sold on an average of 1446 Rs. and the Benares of 1295 Rs. the chest. The outturn of the sale was a little above 40 lakhs of Rupees. The gross receipts of the year have been two millions sterling. If this source of revenue is continued to India for three years more, the debt incurred in the war beyond the Indus will be wiped out.

— The confusion at Gwalior increases. The insurgent chiefs are taking advantage of the strength they have gained to help themselves from the public treasures; and plunder is the order of the day. The deposed regent has fled; and the authority of the British Resident is set at defiance. It was reported on the 12th of June at Agra, that the insurgents had ordered the Resident to quit Gwalior, and the report gained ground up to the 19th, the date of the last advices from Agra. In that case, he will of course apply for advice to Mr. G. Clerk, who will take the most energetic measures. It would be a singular, but not surprizing event, if the next or the succeeding Mail were to announce to the good people at home, that the territories of Scindia had been occupied by a British army.

— The Englishman gives an extract of a letter from Tirhoot of the 20th June, which states that a sad change has come over the golden dreams of the Indigo planters. Many days of drought have burnt up half the crop, and the prospects of the year are blighted. Notwithstanding a few croakers in Bengal, it is all but certain that the season will turn out favourably. 125,000 maunds are now spoken of, but the crop will more probably rise above than fall below that mark. Seldom have we known the river so low at the close of June.

— A case has just been tried in the Supreme Court which reflects great discredit on those who promoted it. A gentleman, who formerly edited a paper and was engaged in mercantile pursuits at Bombay, ordered some shoes of a Cossitollah shoemaker, Mr. Harman, under the name of Montague, to the value of 20 Rs. There was some delay in the payment of the bill owing to Mr. Montague's having been out of town, but the money was freely paid. Mr. Harman however, who had learned that the gentleman had formerly passed under the name of Montague Farmworth—he had dropped the latter name from family considerations—insisted on bringing him up to the bar of the Supreme Court, for fraud. He was honourably acquitted. Sir John Peter Grant in discharging him said that he left the Court untainted and with honour, and that there existed not the shadow of a shade for the charge.

— The Hurkaru says, we shall be happy to hear that the Deputy Governor has requested the Sudder Court to report on the expediency of repealing the law by virtue of which a man was recently sentenced to transportation for not appearing on being proclaimed. The reader will remember that it was a law passed when the district of Kishnaghur was in possession of bands of dacoits; it was a severe law rendered necessary by the extremity of circumstances; a kind of suspension of the Habeas Corpus, which ought to have died out with the occasion. The Court have declared that an alteration of the law will be inexpedient. It must be repealed therefore without their concurrence. It cannot be allowed to stand—in the forty-third year of the nineteenth century.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

THE LOTTERIES.

The Friend of India has a few more words, on the subject of the Lottery Advertisements. Our cotemporary says, that he is satisfied, as far as we are concerned, with our statement, that the Editor of a paper, as Editor, has nothing to do with the advertisement department, but he recommends us to use our "influence with the Proprietor to exclude the gambling notifications altogether." We have no doubt that the Proprietor knows well enough what it becomes him to do in these cases, without any advice from us or from our more worthy cotemporaries. We certainly are not ourselves of opinion, that he is called upon to discontinue the Lottery Advertisements, because the Hurkaru has arrayed itself against all lotteries, public and private. If he had purposed to display his public virtue, in the matter of Lotteries, he would, doubtless, have begun with the Government Lotteries. He would then have shown his consistency, but we cannot see the consistency of advertising the Government Lotteries, circulating the drawings gratis, and then making a stand against the lotteries of private contractors. The Friend, at all events, may assure himself that the advertisements are not inserted in this paper, against the better judgment of any party connected with it, merely for the sake of the profits, which may arise from their insertion. We will undertake to say, that the advertisements appear, not to the prejudice of the Hurkaru's consistency, but that the Hurkaru may steer clear of inconsistency. But, even supposing, that the Hurkaru had not advertised the Government Lotteries, which it so strenuously denounced, it appears to us, that it is requiring somewhat too much of the Press to call upon it to cease from advertising whatsoever it may disapprove. We do not think, it would be fair to charge the Times or the Quarterly Review, with inconsistency, because they may have advertised quack medicines, and descanted upon their injurious effects. To carry out to its full extent the rule, by which some of our cotemporaries would bind us, it is inconsistent in a journal to advertise a book, of the principles of which it does not approve, and therefore we are guilty, in a high degree, whenever we advertise a Puseyite tract or a Tory pamphlet. We do not think it would be possible to act, to its full extent, up to the obligations of such a rule as his; and, as it seems to us highly probable, that some of our cotemporaries will be, ere long, discovered hard at work, straining at gnats and swallowing camels, we shall not attempt to follow them in their vaunted career of consistency.—Hurk. June 23.

Our Serampore contemporary has little hope of us. He has given us up. Henceforth, like the Indian God Yamen he will turn his eye of wrath upon us, for continuing to advertise lotteries after the unanimous voice of the press has condemned them. Well, we are not the only inconsistent persons. We have seen the most loud and most absurd of their present opponents, betting at a horse race and a billiard table, and we really do not understand how that agrees with the straight laced morality that will not mention the temptation, lest some one should be led astray. For our part we have never treated lotteries as criminal. We object to Government Lotteries because they not only give the sanction of the State to the system, but they are also in general so devised as to hold out the highest temptation to gambling, and to cheat the distressed with the hope of sudden prosperity. A lottery for watches and snuff boxes, will not induce people of small means to waste their hard earnings. It may take a little from the superfluities of the rich, not from the pittance of the poor.

At the same time we would prefer seeing all lotteries abolished by law, because they cannot be always rendered fair and harmless, and there is no public advantage in allowing their continuance; but so long as it is legal we consider the advertizing of them on an exact par with announcing Horse races, or best French playing Cards.—Eng. June 23.

We quoted a paragraph from the Friend of India of last week on the subject of the continued advertisement by our daily cotemporaries of Messrs. Methold and Co's. lotteries. That paragraph brought a defence from the parties implicated, the futility of which we exposed. The Friend writes as if he thought there really was something in the point advanced by one of them, though we are perfectly sure that on reflection he must see its worthlessness, as an answer to the charge of inconsistency (if nothing more) brought against these prints. The Friend says that the Hurkaru's declaration that the editor of that paper "is not responsible for the advertisements, which are under the absolute control of the proprietor" is a "fact" that "goes far to exonerate the Editor from blame," and he thereupon adds,—"but we wish he would use his influence with the proprietor to exclude the gambling notifications altogether." Our Serampore cotemporary must pardon us for saying that this is doing injustice to the cause he advocates. He must know with ourselves that an editor who respects his position will have supreme control over a journal while it is committed to his charge; and on the sufficient ground that the public has nothing to do with the proprietor or shareholders, but visit on the gentleman, in whose hands it is placed the credit or discredit that may attach to its columns. If the responsibility be not in the editor, no one can tell where it may rest, for if one proprietor is responsible for one department, another may be for a second, and another for a third. The protection proposed in the case of advertisements might with equal propriety be extended to every line that does not proceed from the editorial pen. But in the present case, as regards the Hurkaru, the Friend has not looked at the question in its strongest light. He has not remembered that in a Weekly journal, with the same proprietor, these lotteries have been editorially denounced as fraudulent. This might have suggested that we are not singular in the view we take of editorial responsibility; for it is fair to infer that if that proprietor be looked upon as paramount in authority as to what shall appear and what not, the liberty of employing a charge of no light character against him would hardly have been taken in one of his own journals. Again, we may observe that the Friend assumes that there is no proprietorship in the Editor, though what is generally known we suppose he knows. We rather suspect that this is one of his strokes of quiet sarcasm, to which we are very sorry the Editor of the Hurkaru should have exposed himself. We sincerely regret having had to write a syllable that may be disagreeable to that gentleman, but on a subject of this kind, essentially a public one, it was necessary that we should expose what we considered, and still consider, a grave public wrong. As we have before said, the public must judge of the propriety of the course taken. We have already had some reason to know that our course has been approved. It will be seen that the Friend of India alludes to another Lottery: we don't understand, and we certainly do not approve, alluding on an occasion of this kind to parties, and not naming them. If it is right to speak at all, it is right to speak plainly. The paragraph which alludes to Messrs. Latty, Brothers, is severe, and writing it ourselves we would have done ourselves the justice of saying explicitly of whom we wrote. Without upholding their lottery, we see a very wide difference between it, and the lotteries of Messrs. Metheld and Co., and we have only not alluded to the former before because we would not name them together.—Cal. Star, June 23.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CALCUTTA BIBLE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Dear Sir,—Allow me to make in your columns a few remarks on the last letter of 'A member of the Calcutta Bible Society.' That letter is fitted, though not intended, to make a false impression on the public mind by its misstatement of facts, and as one of the twenty-seven missionaries who have protested against the arbitrary proceedings of the Bible Society, however desirous to follow peace, I cannot think of allowing the misstatement to pass without correction. Had you known all the facts of the case, you would have put the 'Member' right in your editorial columns, which would have saved me the trouble of writing this letter, and you the trouble of inserting it. Arguments may be often left to themselves to be approved or condemned by what is called a 'discerning public,' but statements of what are called facts imperatively require counter-statements to be made by those, who believe themselves misrepresented, that the public may have the means of passing a right judgment. Hitherto, like most of my brethren, I have satisfied myself with signing the Circular, which you have inserted, and writing my views on the quæstio vexata for the Society, with which I am connected. The decision of the Bible Society, and the acting out that decision came first, and the discussion came last, at least as far as the missionaries in Hindoostan are concerned. What should have been first, may be left by your readers to decide. I now state the fact to show what a damper the course pursued by the Bible Society has laid on discussion, and to explain the silence of most of the missionaries. Such a letter however as that of the 'Member' will not allow them to remain silent.

Permit me to give a statement of facts, which may be compared with the statement of the 'Member'. In the words of the minute published by the Bible Society, the form I'sá* has been followed with few exceptions for 1200 years, has been adopted in the Koran, and by all Mahomedan writers and also in the Persian and Oordoo publications of the Auxiliary Bible Society. Our Baptist brethren have for some time used Yusúa in their editions of the Oordoo scriptures. As their versions are chiefly read and circulated by members of their own denomination, members of other denominations did not feel themselves called on to express public disapprobation. Whether the Baptist missionaries in Upper India approved of the change appears questionable from the fact that most of them to my personal knowledge always speak I'sá, although the books they circulate have Yusúa. One of them when asked why he said one thing, while the book said another, frankly replied he did not like to use the new form when speaking to the people, lest they should think we had got a new Saviour. Thus in the use of Yusúa no progress has been made, although we are beginning to reap the evil arising from the discrepancy between the books which are circulated, and the words we employ. The translation Society for Upper India has Yusúa in its books, but its operations have been on so limited a scale, that any particular notice of them is unnecessary. The Calcutta Bible Society has within the last two or three years been sending forth editions of the Scriptures in Oordoo, in which the name of our Saviour is written Yisú, (Yisú and Yusúa are different modes of transfering the Arabic letters.) Strange to say, this departure from the practice of 1200 years, and from the course invariably pursued by themselves since the formation of the Society, was effected without the question being ever considered in Committee! Public bodies, it seems, as well as private individuals, must have their seasons of repose. The editions sent forth excited much dissatisfaction. They were incorrectly printed—some of them abounded with errors—proper names were greatly altered, and the name of the Saviour appeared in a form generally unacceptable. Complaints soon reached the ears of the Committee, and they wisely listened to them. To meet the complaints occasioned by the mode in which proper names were spelt, a circular was issued containing, if my memory be faithful, 300 names. In this list the name of our Saviour was spelt Yisú. No person thought it likely this form would be adopted, and though most in reply wrote the name differently, I believed not an individual made a comment on the form proposed by the Bible Society. The impression was that as in former cases when the advice of the Missionaries was asked, effect would be given to the views of the Majority. It appears that regarding several of the names a diversity of opinion existed among the missionaries, though I should think from the answers sent, a list of names might be drawn up, which would be generally acceptable. The Committee however deferred giving a formal decision on the names in general. Circumstances occurred to bring the name of our Saviour before them, and how did they act, when it was seen that their views and those of the Missionaries in Hindoostan diverged? The great majority of the Committee were ignorant of Hindoostanee, and had no occasion to use Hindoostanee versions. The Missionaries in Hindoostan by being asked to give their opinion of 300 names, of which the name of the Saviour was one, had not had their attention specially directed to the subject, and the reasons for their preference were not known. In order to the views of the Bible Society being carried out in Hindoostan, the approbation of the Missionaries was indispensible. Translators appointed and approved by the Bible Society itself were among the number of those who were opposed to their views. The question was a simple and direct one. The views and feelings of the Missionaries might be easily ascertained. In these circumstances what might have been expected from the Christian feelings, the brotherly kindness, the wise policy of the Bible Society's Committee? At the least might we not have expected them to have corresponded with their brethren in the Mofussil, and have tried by argument and persuasion to decide the matter, before proceeding to decide it by authority? What was the course actually pursued by the Committee? One of their number—a gentleman in the Civil Service, of whose character I cannot speak with too high respect—proposed that Yusúa be adopted, and after some discussion his proposal was carried. The only Missionary from Hindoostan in Calcutta, who is as your Correspondent truly says, 'one of the best Oordoo scholars in the Missionary body' objected to the proposal, as stated in the minute of the Committee, but finally yielded and gave in his adherence. When the measure was carried, the minute drawn up by the Committee was printed, and widely circulated. It was sent to the Missionaries, and they were informed that the decision was arrived at after much consideration. You may well suppose how astonished they were at this treatment. Far better that they had not been asked an opinion at all, than to be treated in this manner. This was not all. The Committee proceeded at once to act on the decision. They did not stop even here. It is understood that they sent their minute to the Religious Societies of England and America, entreating them to approve the step they had taken, and to refuse aid to those who would not fall in with their decision, thus taking the unusual course of bringing a strange question before the tribunal of England and America, to trouble the minds of the good people beyond the seas, without making the attempt to discuss and settle the question in this country. This step in common with my brethren I deeply regret. When the Missionaries saw that an apparent attempt was made to force their compliance with a measure for which they saw no good reason, and which they feared would in practice be attended with much inconvenience and evil, they had no resource left but either to yield to a measure which they conscientiously disapproved, or to appear before the tribunal, which the Committee had already chosen. The latter course they have pursued, but for obvious reasons with great reluctance. They knew they were exposing themselves to misrepresentations, and the letter of the member of the Bible Society verifies their expectations. The protest to the Home Societies was drawn up by one of our number, and read and signed by the rest because it substantially stated our views. Had we been able to meet together, and after full consideration to have written out our views, the protest might have been more complete, but as it is, it sufficiently expresses our sentiments. That document you see is signed by twenty-seven Missionaries. To it are attached the names of Mr. Bowley of Chunar, Mr. Smith of Benares, Mr. Mather of Mirzapore, and of other missionaries, whose translations of the Scriptures, published by the Bible Society, are widely circulated at the present day. The Missionary body have with great unanimity joined in the measure.

Compare this statement of facts with the statement of your correspondent. The facts I have stated I know to be correct. Your correspondent should not be ignorant, and yet there is a strange discrepancy in our facts. He says the Committee and translators are on one side, and some of the distributors and readers of the Bible on the other, and yet with the exception of one, every Missionary in Hindoostan, who has translated for the Calcutta Bible Society, is in the number of the protestors! The 'Member' may say that those who have made the translation of the New Testament, which has just issued from the press, are on the side of the Committee. On this I remark, 1st. They are not on the side of the Committee in the way which he represents. Your correspondent states that the proposal came from the translators themselves, one of whom is a Missionary from the Mofussil. The minute of the Society tells another tale. That Missionary opposed the measure of the Bible Society at first, and afterwards consented to it, when I suppose he considered opposition vain. To say that the proposal came from him is nearly as correct as to say that the Queen of Tahiti of her own accord placed herself under the paternal care of France. The proposal proceeded from a member of the Bible Society, who is understood to have taken a part in the translation of the New Testament just published. 2ndly. Does the measure, which has been lately passed, embrace future editions of the Scriptures? Such is the intention of the Bible Society. Such is the fear of the Missionaries; otherwise, why should they lay their views before their friends at home? Does not the measure then affect all the translators and distributors of the Oordoo Scriptures? To speak of Mr. Bowley and such men as mere distributors and readers of the Oordoo Scriptures, is not worthy of a member of the Bible Society, who should know their services.—After the facts I have stated, can you keep your gravity when you read these words: 'Are both translators and Committee to be borne down by this third party? What Committee would or could work in such circumstances?' This is enough to remind one of the well known fable of the wolf and the lamb coming to the same spot to drink. Surely the 'Member' must be like the man, who complained he was not free, because he was not at liberty to force others to act and think as he did.

* To prevent loading my letter with characters which are strange to many who take an interest in this controversy, I wish to use throughout Roman letters. I'sá stands for عيسى (the Mussulman form) I'sá for يساع and Yusúa for يسوع the form adopted by the Bible Society. Throughout the "members" letter يساع is, I suppose by a mistake of the printer, always written instead of يسوع.

Your correspondent gravely instructs us from a regard to truth and justice to send the papers of the Bible Society, wherever we send our protest, forgetting that the Bible Society had sent its documents before to the very parties to whom our protest is addressed. Their papers are far more widely circulated than ours. May I therefore call on the 'Member,' from a regard to truth and justice to make the circulation of our protest as extensive, as the circulation of the Bible Society's statements? For instance, in his zeal for fair play, why not get it inserted in the Calcutta Christian Observer?

I can abate the wonder of your Correspondent in reference to our silence about J. H's. rejoinder to W. That rejoinder did not come to hand till the protest was written and extensively signed. As we were not convinced by J. H's. rejoinder, we saw no necessity for preventing the protest from going home as it was.

I now leave your readers to judge of the facts stated by a 'Member of the Bible Society.' I had wished to have considered the 'Member's review of the controversy, but the length of this communication forbids. You say 'brevity is the soul of wit.' I must be very witless, for brevity is beyond my reach.—In a few days I hope to take up the point I have now left, and to show the incorrectness of the often repeated assertion that there is principle on the side of the Bible Society, and expediency with the objectors—that the one party are influenced by conscience, and cannot yield, while the others are not influenced by conscience, and should yield.

I have the highest respect for the members of the Bible Society, but I know the best of men can do wrong, and when they do wrong, they should be withstood to the face. The difference between the Bible Society and its constituents has become public, the Bible Society and its members taking the lead in the matter, and in self defence we are obliged to come before the public too. I hope that the Bible Society will still see the propriety of retracing its steps. That its members have been influenced by the best motives I am assured, but that they have pursued a course fitted to break up our harmony, I am equally convinced. Let them obtain another such victory as they have obtained, and co-operation is in the notion of things impossible. This separation of those who should be one is to be deprecated for their sakes, for ours, and for the sake of our common Christianity.

Yours sincerely,
A MOFUSSIL MISSIONARY.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—Will you favour me by inserting these lines in reply to your remarks on the resolution of the Auxiliary Bible Society relative to the Orthography of the name of Jesus? I would commence by requesting you to strike out every word that may savour of an unchristian or party feeling.

It is not my intention to advert to the circumstances which led to the separation of the Baptist Body from the Bible Society, the subject which occupies so considerable a portion of your article, further than to express my hope that none will now be induced to enter into a public discussion of the matter. It is a question of principles on which much may be said, and has been said, on both sides. While some may hold with you that in order to the full development of a Catholic spirit, a Society, like the Bible Society, should allow each translator to follow his own conscientious convictions, even in points of doctrine; others may think that "the law of Christian action is plainly set forth in the Apostolic exhortation, 'whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing:' and that unity of judgment and profession are here pointed out as calling us to united co-operation up to the limit of our present attainment."* At present, however, the discussion can do no good. There is no body of Christians with whom a great many of the members of the Bible Committee co-operate with more harmony and good-will than with their Baptist brethren; and sincerely do I hope that you will not force on a discussion which may have the effect of disturbing the feeling which exists between them; a discussion, too, which is beside the real question at issue.

In regard to the mode of writing the name of Jesus, I do not find fault with you for a full and decided expression of your opinion; but I think the Bible Society may fairly ask for a correct statement of facts. The concluding part of your article leads to the inference that the question is one merely of spelling. The spelling of the name is unquestionably involved in it, but the real question is one of a change of names. Were one to take your name, for instance, and invert the order of the letters, you would scarcely say that this was a mere difference of spelling.

It is urged that it is a matter of indifference how the name is written, whether it be the name according to the New Testament, or whether it be the Mahomedan corruption. Could I be satisfied of this, as a member of the Bible Committee, I would at once place on its table a motion for rescinding the resolution. But there is the name given by God himself, because it has a meaning; a term significant in itself. When it is stated that the angel said to Joseph, "Thou shalt call his name I'sá," I deny that he ever said any such thing. Can the denial be disproved? Where is man's authority for changing, or maintaining the change of the name? Is it not being wise above what is written, to call this a matter of indifference? To say so may be termed folly or bigotry or any thing else: but it is the folly or bigotry of adhering to the Word of God.

Now most languages have their rule or practice for transferring proper names from foreign languages. The affinity between the Hebrew and the Arabic materially assists the transfer from the former into the latter language. The Hebrew name of the Saviour has its correct corresponding term in the Arabic, as shewn by every Arabic Bible, and some Arabic Lexicons. The term used by the Mahomedans is not the same. The offence of the Bible Society consists in their desire to supersede the Mahomedan corruption, and to restore the correct name.

You advise the Bible Society to concede the point. I am sure they would readily do so, did a sense of duty permit the concession. But in offering this advice, you appear to have lost sight of a very material fact. It is one of the most powerful subsidiary arguments of the Society that the change which they advocate has been in some measure, at least, accomplished by the Baptist Body. Your statement* is that this Presidency embraces 61 Baptist Missionaries, while all other Protestant Missions put together, number but 56. The 61 are scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, in the Upper as well as in the Lower Provinces. The Baptist Body are printing and circulating the Scriptures in Oordoo almost, if not quite, as fast as the Bible Society. They write the name of the Saviour in the same form as that adopted by the Bible Society; and thus, were the latter to rescind its resolution, the two great bodies publishing the Scriptures would in practice be opposed to each other, though agreeing in their views. I pretend not to know the opinions of individual members of the Baptist missionaries; but as they circulate the Baptist editions, they would all practically be against the Society. Is it advisable that the Saviour should be declared under different names? The Baptists declare him under one name. The Bible Committee believe that name to be the correct one. Agreeing in opinion with the Baptist Body in this no unimportant point, would it be right for the Committee to differ from them in practice; and by this difference create an evil of far more prejudicial tendency to the cause of truth, than can possibly be caused by a substitution of the true name for the Mahomedan corruption? Do you condemn the Baptist translators for the course they have taken? If not, then try rather to induce the minority to go with the majority, than seek to perpetuate differences between them.

In your concluding clause you say, "you feel constrained to raise your feeble but earnest protest against the folly, you had almost said the guilt, of making the spelling of a word of five letters, a new Shibboleth of party." This is strong language, dear Sir, when applied by the Christian Editor of a Christian Journal to a body of Christian men acting under a sense of duty, in resolving to call the Saviour in versions of the Scriptures published by them, by the name, which, their opponents themselves being judges, is the correct name. Pray forego the use of harsh terms; the Christian men whose part in this discussion you have taken, have not employed them, and would not wish you to do it. Terms such as these are calculated rather to irritate than to heal.

I am, dear Sir,
Yours sincerely,
J. H.

RELIGIOUS.

SIR R. PEEL ON LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S FORMER EDUCATION BILL.

"I shall offer (said Sir Robert Peel) the most strenuous opposition in my power to any plan that violates perfect liberty of Education.

"I think the noble lord (Lord John Russell) must not attempt to introduce the system of compulsory assessment into parishes. Where the Dissenters form a great minority, and the rest of the inhabitants of the parish are members of the Established Church, I cannot believe that the principle of compulsory assessment will give satisfaction to the Dissenters, or that they will submit, in cases where the members of the Church preponderate in the vestry, to a tax imposed by them for the support of schools. I hope the noble Lord will take care that he does not expose the poor-law to unpopularity, on account of any unnecessary interference with Education. I, for one, am deeply convinced of the absolute necessity and of the moral obligation of providing for the education of the people; but I am, at the same time, perfectly convinced that this can be done in this country, where so much religious dissent prevails, only by leaving it to the voluntary exertions of the parties themselves, and by permitting each to educate his children, as he at present is at liberty to do, in those great principles of faith in which they were born. I cannot help expressing my confident belief, that the Church of England is now awakened to the absolute necessity, not by force, not by compulsion, not by interfering, in the slightest degree, with the principles of religious freedom, but awakened to the absolute necessity of assuming that position which she ought to assume, in constant and cordial co-operation with the landed proprietors and others of the country; and that the only satisfactory way of having a system of Education, (which ought to be founded upon the basis of religion,) in this country, is for each party to act for themselves, imposing no restriction upon others."—Debate, February 12, 1839.

A meeting of the friends to Protestant Missions was lately held in the great room, Exeter-hall, for the purpose of adopting such measures as were considered urgently necessary in consequence of the recent seizure of the sovereignty of Tahiti by the French, and for securing the general interests of British missions in the islands of the South Pacific. The room was not full. The following was agreed to: "That this meeting, representing different sections of the Protestant Christian churches in Britain, has received with feelings of the deepest sorrow and the strongest reprehension, the intelligence of the unjust assumption of sovereignty by the French in the island of Tahiti, and the establishment by force of the system of Popery in that island."

The Rev. Mr. Close, the Rev. Mr. Bickersteth, and others who seceded from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the committee having at first rather avoided a pledge on the subject of Puseyism, have rejoined.

CLERICAL PROTEST AGAINST PUSEYISM AND POPERY.—The following protest has been agreed to, and is in process of signature by the clergy throughout England and Ireland:—

"The Declaration and Protest of the undersigned Clergy of the Church of England, called forth by the exigencies of the present times:—

"We, the undersigned presbyters of the United Church of England and Ireland, declare our firm and unaltered attachment to the doctrines of our holy religion, as they are embodied in the formularies of our Church, expressed in her Liturgy, and defined in her Articles, taken in their plain and literal sense, and as the same are generally set forth in the Homilies, and other writings of the fathers of the Reformation.

"And we do hereby solemnly renew our protest, in conformity with our ordination vows, against the errors of the Church of Rome, as those are confirmed by the decrees of the Council of Trent, authorised in the creed of Pope Pius IV., and maintained in the writings of Romish doctrines and modern apologists. And we further testify against any modified system of Popery, which, by undermining the supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures, as containing all things necessary to salvation, by subverting the great doctrine of justification, as contained in Article XI. and teaching for doctrines the commandments of men, tends to lead men's minds back to the errors and practices abjured by our venerable Reformers.

"Finally, while we deprecate all attempts to re-establish a spiritual despotism, by denying to the people all rights of judgment in matters of faith, we desire to make a public profession of our unshaken attachment to the Church of England, her apostolic order and wholesome discipline; and of our willingness to render due obedience to our ecclesiastical rulers in all things lawful."—Pat.

On 20th April there was a meeting of the Church Education Society, in Dublin, at which the primate, Lord John G. Beresford, presided. The speakers were Lord Clancarty, the new bishop of Cashel (Dr. Daly), the Rev. Dr. Romney Robinson, Mr. Joseph Napier, &c. The tone of the speakers was furious against the national system of education, and much indignation was expended against the ministry for having adopted and maintained that system. Lord Clancarty read a portion of a letter which he had received from Sir R. Peel, in reply to an application on the subject, in which the right hon. baronet repeated the determination of the government to continue the usual grant to the national Board, and to refuse aid to any other system.—London Mail.

SUFFRAGAN BISHOPS.—Communications have recently been made to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners on the subject of the appointment of suffragan or assistant bishops. An act of Parliament (26 Henry VIII., c. 14, repealed by 2 Philip and Mary, c. 8, and revived 1 Elizabeth, c. 1) is now in existence, which provides for the institution of such an order. The Rev. Dr. D'Oyley, rector of Lambeth, in a letter addressed to the commissioners, suggests that in every diocese some discreet and respected clergyman might be appointed, to whom the sum of 200*l.* per annum might be allowed, and which might be easily provided for when the incomes of the bishops shall be finally settled. The great objection, that interference might be apprehended with the just prerogative of the Crown as to the free appointment of new bishops to sees which may be at any time vacant, on account of the expectation that might prevail that one who had already been consecrated as a suffragan would have a prior claim, is thus met by Dr. D'Oyley in his letter to the commissioners:—"Any such objection may be at once precluded by a distinct declaration that no advantage will ever be given to any person for an appointment to one of the episcopal sees from the mere fact of his having previously held the appointment of a suffragan bishop. The suffragans would assist the bishops in the consecration of churches, confirmations, and other duties, but the power of conferring holy orders would be reserved to the principal bishop of each diocese, except under very peculiar circumstances." It is contended that if such appointment were made for Liverpool, Manchester, and other towns in the diocese of Chester, there would be no occasion for the contemplated abolition of one of the sees in North Wales.—Times.

Mrs. Wood, the Vocalist, who had been removed to a convent at York, has since returned to her husband's residence, at Woolley Moor; the pain and anxiety of being absent from husband and child being greater than her religious enthusiasm.—London Mail.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—PREPARATIONS FOR GOING OUT.—In this good town of Paisley the most active preparations are really going on in earnest, by the most sincere and energetic of the Churchmen, for a separation of their connexion with the State. The Rev. Mr. M'Naughtan, of the High Church, with every member of his session, and with at least a thousand of his congregation, are quite fixed on retiring; and, in proof that there is no shamming, they have this week taken from the lessees the Old Low Church as a temporary place of worship. We believe the session of this congregation were in terms with more than one of the dissenting congregations in town for the use of their churches during part of the Sabbath, but by the bargain we have referred to, they will undoubtedly be better served, and, at small outlay, have a comfortable church entirely at their own disposal. It is now understood that Dr. Burns, of St. George's, and Mr. Stevenson, of the Middle, both remain in the State Church, but besides a great body of the most zealous of their members, with the exception of the minister and one elder in each of the two sessions, all the other members of session will retire.—Renfrewshire Reformer.

SCOTTISH CHURCH.—The approaching meeting of the General Assembly is looked forward to with the greatest anxiety, and some entertain the belief that the "Moderates" will be in a position to elect Principal Macfarlane, of Glasgow University, Moderator. Dr. Chalmers has been elected a member of Assembly by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, in order that his supporters may bring him forward for the same high office; and the name of Dr. Lee has also been mentioned, but apparently without any authority.

Efforts are continued to prepare churches for the seceding ministers; but with what success is doubtful —"With regard to the subscriptions in aid of the 'Free Presbyterian Church,'" says the Edinburgh Weekly Journal, "there appears some discrepancy between the urgent and rather desponding appeals of the Nonintrusion Papers, and the assurance of Dr. Chalmers that subscriptions and donations are coming in thick and fast, 'like a set rain, at the rate of 1,000*l.* a day.' It is intended to raise 300,000*l.* for the building of six hundred churches, which are to be erected and finished by the end of May. This, we incline to think, will prove an architectural impossibility; at least if the edifices are to be of such solidity as to last for many future May-days."

The Marquis of Breadalbane, who has for some years past lent his countenance to the Non-intrusion party in the Church, has at length seen fit to retreat from his alliance, in so far, at least, as regards an immediate secession. It appears from a correspondence betwixt his Lordship and Mr. Dunlop, that the commoner had requested him to become one of the provisional trustees, in whom the property of the new kirks was to be vested. The Marquis declined the intended honour, and demurred to the propriety of a precipitate separation, at least, before the Legislature had definitively refused to provide a remedy for the existing difficulties. It is to be inferred from Mr. Dunlop's letter, that the secession will certainly take place in May; and that there will be two General Assemblies, one of the Established and another of the Seceding Church.

The Standard publishes a long letter on the secession, from Sir G. Sinclair to the Earl of Aberdeen, dated Brighton, 25th April. Sir George writes under the fear of the impending disruption of the Church; which extorts a mass of observations that must have taken him some time to write. He expresses a belief that the seceders will be numerous, and urges Government to make a last effort to avert the calamity. "Permit me to suggest one more expedient. Let the Cabinet summon Drs. Chalmers, Welch, and Gordon, to London, and have an amicable conference with these distinguished men; let each party act with perfect frankness; let all the bearings and branches of the question be fully and dispassionately gone into; and I should entertain a most sanguine hope, that when the Church has explained her minimum and the State its maximum, all difficulties might be removed, and peace through God's blessing be restored—scarcely indeed at the eleventh hour, but when twelve was just about to strike"

The Aberdeen Herald alleges that the Government has intimated to its adherents among the patrons, that they had better be prepared to present in case of any secession.—The Glasgow Chronicle says that the Government intend to bring in a measure for settling the affairs of the kirk in a few days before the meeting of the General Assembly. The heads of the bill have been seen by parties in Scotland interested in the matter, and we understand they are such as will satisfy the "forty thieves," and the Glasgow "memorialists."

As it is impossible for us to estimate the probable strength of parties in the approaching Assembly, we give the statements of the Scotch press.

The Moderates have published a roll of the members of Assembly, according to which they bring out a majority over the Evangelicals of 19, or, if joined by the Middlemen—(calculated at 17)—of 36. This list, however, is both defective and inaccurate. Several Presbyteries are blank, and two in which there have been double returns are classed as having each made only one return, while several individuals are incorrectly represented as belonging to the Moderate party. Supplying the omissions, and correcting the errors, so far as we have been able, the state of the returns appears to be as follows:—

| | Moderates. | Evangelicals. | Middlemen. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Single returns,... | 155 ......... | 155 ......... | 17 |
| Double returns, | 48 ...... | 54 ...... | 1 |

—Edinburgh Witness.

The Edinburgh Evening Post makes out a clear numerical majority against the Non-intrusionists in the coming Assembly. The Scotsman also intimates an opinion that the returns tend that way; the Edinburgh Courant, while it offers no opinion on the relative strength of parties, says that much interest is excited respecting the course the Assembly will pursue, and which party will be in the majority; also that the Moderatorship of Dr. Chalmers will be contested, both Principal Lee, of Edinburgh, and Principal Macfarlane, of Glasgow, being named as competitors. The Courant thinks, however, that the disruption will take place at the outset, and before any business is entered upon, by purging the roll of the quoad sacra ministers, expecting that interdicts would be applied for and obtained against those parties taking their seats, and thinking it more probable that the Non-intrusion party will simply protest and retire, rather than venture to break those interdicts. The Non-intrusionists, or retiring, seems to intend meeting in Dr. Candlish's new church, Lothian road, the erection of which is proceeding so rapidly that the builder speaks with confidence of getting it up in time. It would certainly be judicious in the constitutional party to arm themselves with interdicts in the manner proposed, and in that way effect the exclusion of the quoad sacra ministers; although, if their majority should be very decided, the triumph would be far less equivocal, were the same course followed as in the Synod of Aberdeen, which, at its meeting refused to elect a Moderator, or proceed to business, unless the quoad sacra Intrusionists, both ministers and elders, were struck off the roll. The Synod effected this by a majority of 100 to 55. Sir W. Drysdale at the Edinburgh town council meeting brought forward a motion for a remit to the law committee to make provision for regular public worship in the city churches which may be left vacant. A Mr. Scott met this motion with an amendment, proposing to offer the use of the churches to the association presently advertising for sites on which to erect churches for the retiring ministers, at such moderate yearly rent as may be agreed on. Consideration of both motions was postponed.—Berwick and Kelso Warder.

As the General Assembly approaches, the interest in the long pending church controversy naturally becomes more intense. No one now seriously doubts that a secession, and to a considerable extent, is inevitable, but much speculation prevails as to the mode in which the same will take place. That will depend on the relative strength of parties in the Assembly. According to a computation by a contemporary, the Moderate party are stated at 199, the Convocationists also at 199, and the ex Convocationists, or those who do not deem the circumstances adequate to justify a separation, at 20. The 199 Moderates include thirty-eight returns from Presbyteries which split into two on the quoad sacra question, each section making a return; the 199 Convocationists, on the other hand, include 45 similar returns; the representatives so returned are seven more than on the Moderate side, in consequence of the number of delegates to the Assembly being dependent on the number of the Presbytery, and the recognition of the quoad sacra members of course swelling the list. Independent of the 45 thus emanating from the Non-Intrusion section of Presbyteries, the 199 also include about 35 quoad sacra members. We have thus 80 disputed commissions on the side of the Convocationists, and 38 on that of the Moderate party. It will thus be seen that the preliminary movement of the Assembly, or the regular trial of strength, will give rise to various and complicated considerations. Supposing the whole body we have enumerated to take their seats and vote on the initiative question, the result would turn on the course taken by the 20 anti-separation non-intrusionists as to the right of the quoad sacra members. If, again, the disputed commissions on both sides were to be put hors de combat until the unexceptionable representative should decide on their validity, the Moderates would, minus 38, stand 161, and the Convocationists, minus 80, at 119, or in a minority of 42.

If the General Assembly should by a majority sustain the 35 quoad sacra members, then, on the same principle, the 45 returned by the Non-intrusion section of Presbyteries would be declared validly elected, and the 38 by the Moderate section would, in like manner, be thrown out. Amidst these conflicting elements, it is difficult to foresee what course the respective parties will take to vindicate their principles. There can be no doubt that the General Assembly, according to the gross return, would, in the eyes of both parties, form an heterogeneous and irregular court, because several Presbyteries would be represented by nearly double the number of members to which, by the laws of the church, they are entitled. It is as clear—and we dare say none of the Intrusion party will dispute the assertion—that by the law now declared in the civil courts, the presence of quoad sacra members will be deemed illegal; consequently, any party who conceives himself aggrieved in his civil rights by the proceedings of an Assembly so constituted, will have an unquestionable ground of suspension and reduction. The Non-Intrusion party are fully aware, that this will be the effect of sustaining the claims of their quoad sacra brethren, but as they are resolved to abandon the church, we presume they are indifferent to the fate of those they leave behind. Acting, then, in consistency with their previous course, and recognising those quoad sacra members irrespective of the decrees of the civil courts, our surmise is, that the Non-intrusion party will declare them constituent members of the Assembly, and in the same breath hold the election of the 38 Moderates by sections as inept. If a motion to that effect is supported only by a minority, it will, as a matter of course, fall to the ground, but if by a majority, then the Moderate party will probably resist the decision through the medium of the civil courts. In either view we regard this preliminary question as the crisis. If the Moderate party triumph, the Non-intrusionists will withdraw from the Assembly; if the latter, on the contrary, have a majority, then the Moderates will protest for remeid, and refuse to act with an alleged illegal body. Thus we shall have two Assemblies, and it remains to be seen how the representative of the Crown will act amidst this unhappy discord.

It is currently reported that the election of representatives to the General Assemby, which has just terminated, will leave the more decided portion of the Non-Intrusion party in a minority. In other words, the Moderate party, together with that section of the Non-Intrusionists who do not think affairs have reached that crisis which justifies their separation from the establishment, will unite in some general question as to the repeal of the veto Act, and thus make the schism the act, not of the General Assembly, but only of a minority of the church. That there will be schism to a greater or less extent is no longer doubtful, for Government have taken their ground, and in anticipation of this majority in the General Assembly will await the issue without taking any further steps towards the adjustment of the controversy. Supposing, therefore, that the anti-separation party do constitute a majority, they will commence the rescissory process with a view to placing matters in a train for the interference of the legislature. They will elect their own moderator, they will purge the roll, repone the Strathbogie ministers as far as regards the records of the court, and, in fact, put the ecclesiastical polity in harmony with what is called the law of the land. The minority again will retire from the church, after having made a last and emphatic declaration of their principles; and we presume this will be at an early stage of the Assembly, for the leaders of that party stand on too high ground to stoop to an ineffectual struggle with a majority, or to countenance by their presence any active invasion of those principles for which they have so long battled. Though the secession may not be so great as was at one time expected, it will still be sufficient to give a shock to the establishment. No church could sustain the loss of so many distinguished men without being for the time shaken to its centre; it will not be destroyed, for it is too firmly planted and too well supported by the national resources, not forgetting the numerous and excellent pastors whose conscience still prompts them to cling to the church of the state, as the most efficient instrument in inculcating religion and morals over the length and breadth of the land, and as affording a stay to Christianity which no institution supported by purely voluntary oblations could adequately supply.—Caledonian Mercury.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE SCOTCH SECESSION.—Active preparations are in progress here among the adherents of the Free Presbyterian Church for the completion of the plans. Sites for at least two or three churches will, we believe, be fixed upon this week; and arrangements are being made for the use of several Dissenting churches in the city, after the meeting of Assembly, and until the new erections can be got ready.—Perth Advertiser. Formal application was made on Tuesday last to the Second United Secession Congregation here, for a piece of ground upon which to build a new church, or rather chapel, for the Rev. Mr. Cupples, which was refused; but they can be at no loss for building-ground in Stirling, and in good situations too. This will be adding another place of public worship; and, if appearances are realized, we shall have more churches to a population under 11,000, who possess already church accommodation for 12,750.—Stirling Observer.

An important decision, as it respects the power of the Pope and his bishops has been made in the State of Louisiana. A dispute arose between the wardens of a Catholic church in New Orleans and their pastor, in consequence of which the wardens requested the bishop to remove the minister. The bishop declined complying with their request, whereupon the wardens refused to pay him the stipulated salary. A suit to recover the salary was instituted, on the ground that the bishop possessed the power, derived from the Pope, to assign such minister as he deemed proper to the church, and that it was the duty of the proper officers of the church to make provision for the payment of the salary. The Court decided that they could recognize no such principle as binding in Louisiana. The spiritualities of the Church might be under the control of the Pope and his bishops, but the temporalities were subject only to the laws of the general states and the United States, and no suit for services rendered by the plaintiff could be sustained unless it was shown that they were performed at the request or by the authority of the defendants. Verdict for the defendants. This is a blow to Popery in this country, inasmuch as it greatly restricts the power of the bishops.—Record.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE QUEEN AND LORD MELBOURNE.—On the morning of Her Majesty's confinement a special messenger arrived at Brocket-hall, the seat of Viscount Melbourne, with a despatch from His Royal Highness Prince Albert, announcing the gratifying intelligence of Her Majesty's safety. We have much pleasure in announcing this amiable act of the Prince in relieving the anxiety of one who is well known to be so devoted in his loyal attachment to Her Majesty.—Weekly Paper.

THE HON. AND REV. CHARLES COURTENAY has been appointed Chaplain to the Queen. This is a compliment to the zealous endeavours of the Earl of Devon in behalf of the Tory Government. The appointment is in itself not a thing to be despised. There are four hundreds of pounds for money payment, apartments within the precincts of the Palace, and under the beam of the Royal countenance—to say nothing of the Maids of Honour. Such an appointment is considered the highway to a bishopric. The young divine is Puseyite—chin deep. The solemn gravity of his countenance indicates the severity of his creed. Steadfast in his devotions, strict in discipline, and unswerving in his duty, the Hon. and Rev. Charles Courtenay is looked up to as a bright example by those who cast a longing lingering look behind, and fancy that the dim vista of the past is the far off future—that Popery which hath been is the Popery which they have a "mission" to restore.—Western Times.

SIR GEORGE HAYTER'S GREAT PICTURE—THE REFORMED HOUSE OF COMMONS.—We took occasion, some weeks back, to call attention to the very interesting and scientific exhibition of electro-magnetic machinery at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly. An additional inducement to visit that building has since been offered to the public in the shape of Sir Geo. Hayter's noble painting of the House of Commons. Ten years of the artist's life have been devoted to this great work, which contains nearly four hundred portraits, and gives a peep into a scene that has now become matter of history, the old House of Commons. The illusion is most surprising; and, at the first glance from a proper point of view, the spectator can hardly believe that he merely beholds a piece of canvas. The arrangement of the members, the perspective, the very haze of a crowded room, give the effect of a real scene; and on nearer approach, the figures in the foreground, particularly Lord Grey, Lord Melbourne, Sir Robert Peel, the venerable Primate, and the Great Captain, stand out in the freshness and relief of life itself. The painting is a grand national work, and a veritable triumph of the artist.—Pat.

It is reported that Lieut.-Gen. Sir Willoughby Cotton, who was destined to succeed Sir Edward Blakeney in Ireland, has been offered the command at Malta.

It is understood that Sir Thomas M'Mahon has monstrated against the appointment of a junior officer, Sir Hugh Gough, to the Commander-in-Chiefship in India. It is said that Thomas has been offered the command at Malta, and that, in the event of his acceptance, Sir Charles Napier will be Commander-in-Chief at Bombay. Other reports say that Sir F. Adams will succeed Sir H. Bouverie at Malta, and that Sir J. Fitzgerald will succeed Sir T. M'Mahon.—London Mail.

HORSE GUARDS, APRIL 25.—Her Majesty does not require that the officers of the Army shall wear any other mourning on the present melancholy occasion of the death of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, than a black crape round the left arm, with their uniforms.

By command of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, Commander-in-Chief.

JOHN MACDONALD, Adj.-Gen.

It is believed that the Court of Directors have refused a pension to Major Griffiths, who was severely wounded in the right arm while in command of the 37th B. N. I., on the ground that though the limb is scarcely serviceable, the use of the thumb and index remain.—Ibid.

NEW GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.—The Clare Journal contains the following announcement:—We understand that Sir John Fitzgerald, at present residing at Toonagh, in this county, has been appointed to the distinguished situation of Governor of the Presidency of Bombay. We believe the gallant officer has seen much service in India, and the appointment may be, therefore, looked upon as judicious on the part of the Ministry.—Record.

THE INDIAN ARMY.—Mr. A. E. Frere, an Addiscombe cadet, has been presented with a commission in the 13th Light Infantry, the gallant regiment to which his late brother belonged. A Bengal cavalry cadetship has been presented by Mr. Henry Shank to Mr. Nicholetts, in consideration of the distinguished services of his father-in-law, Sir William Nott.—Atlas.

EASTER INTELLECTUAL RECREATIONS.—In the ensuing week the following public and private exhibitions, amongst many others, will be open to the public:—The British Museum will be open every day to Friday (inclusive) from ten till four; the United Service Institution, from eleven to five every day; the London Missionary Museum, in Bloomfield-street, Bishopsgate, daily; and the East India Museum, in Leadenhall-street, on Saturday, from twelve o'clock. The Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, in Lincoln's-inn-fields, is open from Monday to Thursday, by orders from members; and the late Sir John Soane's Museum, in the same place, on Tuesday and Friday, by tickets, which may be obtained by application on a previous day. The Museum of Economic Geology, at Craig's-court, Charing-cross, is open daily, from eleven till five; and Mr. Saull's Geological Museum, in Aldersgate-street, on Thursday, from eleven o'clock. The Royal Botanic Gardens, at Kew, are open daily, from twelve o'clock till six; and the Gardens of the Horticultural Society, at Chiswick, and the Physic Gardens, at Chelsea, by orders from members. Amongst miscellaneous exhibitions, or objects of interest, may be stated the numismatic collections at the Bullion Office at the Bank, and of coins and medals at the Mint, accessible on application to the proper authorities; the Royal Observatory, at Greenwich, through the Astronomer Royal, and the President of the Royal Society; the Rotunda, at Woolwich, with its collection of models, chiefly connected with naval architecture; the Tower, with its extensive collection of arms and armour; Hampton Court Palace, with the cartoons of Raphael, every day except Saturday and Sunday; Windsor Castle state rooms, daily, except Friday; the National Gallery, Trafalgar-square, on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, from ten till five; and Dulwich Gallery, every day but Wednesday, by tickets, which may be obtained from the principal printsellers in London.—Record.

CHURCH-RATES.—The following appears as an advertisement in the Leicester Mercury:—

Sale Extraordinary.—To be sold by Auction, by Mr. Donisthorpe, on Tuesday, the 18th inst. (commonly called Easter Tuesday), at the Town-hall, Leicester, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, in pursuance of the legal proceedings commenced by John Sarson and John Manson, Churchwardens of St. Martin's:—

Ten handsome drasses, taken from Messrs. Cripps and Kemp.

Twenty-one dresses, and eighty-five yards of brown calico, from T. and W. Stevenson.

Twelve dresses, and six remnants, from Mr. T. Sharpe.

Twelve hats, one dozen of stockings, 13 pairs of do.; 10 pairs of do.; 13 pairs of do.; 6 pairs of do.; all white cotton, from Messrs. W. and G. Baines.

Eighty-five pounds of bacon, from Mr. John West.

Forty pounds and a half of loaf sugar, and 14lbs. of starch, value about 1*l.* 16s., from Mr. Manning, for a rate of 19s.

Copper money, to the amount of 1*l.* 15s., from Mr. W. Thirlby.

Soap, weighing 129lbs. and one cheese, weighing 23lbs., from Messrs. Archer.

Three reams of paper from Mr. Winks.

Three pairs of Blucher boots, one pair of Clarence boots, five pairs of men's shoes, and seven pairs of ladies' slippers, from Mr. Holmes.

Two copper tea kettles, two slop pails, two water cans, one watering pan, and one Dutch oven, from Mr. Shardlow.

Four tin tea kettles, two milk pails, two chamber pails, and two water cans, from Mr. Baines, High-street.

A quantity of printing paper, of various sorts, from Mr. H. A. Collier, Mercury-office.

Seventy-six lbs. of old cheese, at 7d. per lb., worth 2*l.* 1s. 4d.; from Messrs. Swain and Paddy, for a rate of 1*l.* 2s. 1d.

Twenty-eight and a half lbs. of Stilton cheese, at 10d. Value 1*l.* 12s. 6d. from Mr. Joseph Swain for a rate of 12s. 6d.

The attendance of the clergy and members of the Established Church in particular, and of the public in general, is respectfully invited.

Village Squires and Parsons desirous of bestowing gifts of clothing, provisions, &c., at a small expense to themselves, may meet with capital bargains, as the number of bidders is likely to be small.—N. B. No credit given.

EXTRAORDINAY PERSEVERANCE.—The Rev. W. Cary, curate of Estleigh in Devonshire, completed, in the year 1809, a work entitled "A System of Divinity," which extends to 26 volumes. He first attempted to publish it by subscription, but not succeeding, he formed the singular resolution of printing it by his own hand labour. To effect this, he purchased as many worn-out and cast-off types of a country printer as were sufficient to set up two pages, and made a press for himself. With these materials he went to work in 1795, performing every operation himself, and working off page by page. He struck off 40 copies of the first 300 pages, 26 of which he distributed among the Universities, the bishops, the Royal Society, and the reviewers. Disappointed at not receiving the encouragement he expected from this proceeding, he resolved to spare himself any farther expense of paper upon those before whom he had thrown pearls in vain; and as he had only reserved 14 copies of the 40 with which he had commenced, 14 only he continued to print, and at the end of 12 years' unremitting toil, he finished the whole 26 volumes—a rare morceau for the bibliomaniacs of the next century! A parallel to the above is to be found in Fransham, the Norwich Pagan, who died in 1811. He one day made this remark—"Every man has some great object which he wishes to accomplish, and why should I not have mine? I will choose such an one as no mortal being ever yet chose; I will get a cup and ball, and I will catch the ball on the spiked end 666,666 times." And this he actually accomplished. —West of England Conservative.

Sir Thomas George Apreece, Bart., late of Washingly Hall, Huntingdon, who committed suicide at Margate, on the 30th of December, 1842, has by his will, (dated 23d of June, 1836,) bequeathed the whole of his property, amounting to 25,000*l.*, to St. George's Hospital. His sister, Mrs. Amelia Peacocke, intends to dispute the validity of the will in the ecclesiastical court on the ground that the deceased was not of sound mind at the time of executing such will. —Britannia.

TAXES ON RAW MATERIALS.—In the House of Lords, on Thursday 6th April, Lord Monteagle moved for returns relating to the import and export of woollens and cottons during the last seven years, with a view to show the alarming decrease that had taken place, and the impolicy of continuing duties on raw materials, which, by pressing heavily upon our staple trade, give an undue advantage to the foreign manufacturer. Lord Monteagle explained how the duty on cotton had become so much more injurious, than at former periods. Formerly, we exported the finished article; now, we export chiefly the unfinished article. The duty on the raw material presses more severely on the unfinished article, than on the article in the finished state. In what branches of manufacture can we stand foreign competition best? In the higher description of articles, into which the improvements of machinery largely enter. In the coarser articles, into which these improvements enter but little, foreigners can more easily compete with us. This tax, then, becomes the most burdensome in proportion to the nature of the articles in which the foreigners can best compete with us. The tax is as nothing on the higher classes of articles, but is most oppressive on the coarser class. We are, in fact, by this tax on the raw material, creating an adverse tariff, and aggravating the mischief done to us by foreign powers. The Americans have cotton within themselves; the French give a bounty on exportation; there is no duty in the German Union or in Switzerland; in this country only, is there a duty on the raw article. As to the state of the manufacture, comparing the exports of 1840 and 1842, there is a falling off in the declared value of the latter year, of 3,600,000*l.* The wages paid in the cotton trade amount to 18,000,000*l.* a-year; and a falling off of 12 per cent. must create an immense abridgment of the comforts of those employed in it. The woollen trade exhibits still more unfavourable results than the cotton. Comparing together 1840 and 1842, there has been a falling off in the declared value of woollens exported in the latter year, of from 3,000,000*l.* to 2,000,000*l.* In the interval during which the woollen trade, once our greatest staple manufacture, has fallen from 3,000,000*l.* to 2,000,000*l.*, the French woollen trade has increased from 555,000*l.* to 1,064,000*l.* It is calculated, that the wages in the woollen manufacture amount to between 8,000,000*l.* and 9,000,000*l.*; and let noble Lords imagine, said his Lordship, what a mass of the comforts of life to the humbler classes was contained in this amount of wages.—Pat.

THE REVENUE—PROCEEDS OF THE INCOME-TAX.—From the Quarterly Revenue Accounts, given in our last Number, it will have been seen, that there is still a decrease, both on the quarter and on the year, in those branches which indicate the state of trade and the means of consumption. There is a decrease in the Customs, on the quarter, of 275,516*l.*; on the year, of 1,076,336*l.* In the Excise, the decrease on the quarter is only 1,788*l.*; while on the year it is 1,059,093*l.* We may, therefore, hope, from the diminished rate of decrease, that the deterioration of the condition of the great body of consumers has reached its lowest point, and that matters are not growing worse. The operation of the new Tariff may partly account for the falling off of the Customs, although there can be no doubt that it is chiefly owing to the unsettled state of our commercial relations, and the general badness of trade. The decrease under the head of Stamps, of 146,700*l.* on the year, and 6,861*l.* on the quarter, also indicates the stagnation of general business. The Post-office has increased 103,000*l.* on the year, but on the quarter only 2,000*l.* There is an increase under "Miscellaneous," of 425,969*l.* on the year, and 218,303*l.* on the quarter, which is explained by the receipt of a portion of the Chinese silver. Excluding the Income-tax, the decrease on the quarter would have been, 136,287*l.*, and on the year, 1,741,305*l.* But, by the operation of the Income-tax, there is a net increase of 178,945*l.* on the quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of 1842, and of 714,983*l.* on the year.

The total produce of the Income-tax cannot at present be ascertained with certainty. The amount received in the last October and January quarters, gives, of course, the half-year's receipt upon funded property, viz., 571,056*l.*; or 1,142,112*l.* on the year. The receipt of the last quarter is 1,885,232*l.*, of which about 300,000*l.* may be considered as derived from the tax on the dividends, and the remainder as the half-year due upon private income. Were the whole of the first half-year collected, we might calculate that the tax upon private income, exclusive of the funds, would produce about 3,200,000*l.*, and, with the tax upon funded property, 4,300,000*l.* But this is far below the official calculations; and as a large amount upon the first half-year remains to be paid in, it may be concluded, that the total of the year's receipt will not fall short of from five millions to five millions and a half sterling. It has been stated, that the amount paid in the last quarter, contains the whole year's duty on the compositions of the large mercantile concerns; but whether these compositions have been universally paid in, may be doubted. Lord Wharncliffe understood there was a considerable arrear on the half-year. Lord Brougham's estimate, however, that the produce of the Tax would amount to seven millions and a half, must be set down as one of Ex-Chancellor Harlequin's flights of extravagance.—Pat.

Our attention has been directed to an advertisement of a bazaar to be held in Manchester, for the erection of a Popish monastery. A Correspondent says, the parties advertise it for a Church, but it is in truth to raise funds for a Sisterian monastery—to which, of course, a chapel or church will be attached. The following is the advertisement:—

"A Bazaar will be held in the Large Room of the Manchester Town-hall, King-street, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in Easter-week (the 17th, 18th, and 19th April), for the sale of useful and fancy articles, needlework, &c., under the immediate patronage of RIOT AT DANTZIC.—The German papers received to-day contain accounts of a riot on the 11th inst., at Dantzic, caused by the innovation lately introduced by several merchants, of not landing the corn brought in barges from the interior, but transhipping it immediately into vessels in which it was to be exported. This innovation led to a movement on the part of the labouring population, many of whom derived their chief subsistence from the practice that has hitherto prevailed, of always warehousing corn previously to exportation. The rioters proceeded on to the timber-yards and warehouses, and began to arm themselves with bludgeons and such other weapons as they could lay their hands on. The Governor thereupon ordered the general march to be beaten, and the rioters, advancing in one body towards the Butter-market, were stopped by the troops and ordered to disperse. This order they answered only by cries of insult and defiance, and made preparations for an attack on the military. Bloodshed was the consequence. One man was shot dead, and a great number were either wounded or ridden down by the cavalry. A great number of arrests followed. At four o'clock in the afternoon tranquillity appeared o have been re-established.—Atlas.

The Gazette de Cologone and the Journal de la Haye, both papers under the influence of the Prussian Government, publish the following paragraph, under the head of Berlin, 9th of April:—It has been rumoured for some time in this capital, that the surveillance exercised over foreign newspapers will become essentially more strict, inasmuch as these journals contain articles on the internal condition of Prussia. These journals being thus forewarned, will consequently have no one to blame but themselves if they are no longer admitted into the Prussian dominions. The violent attacks which the English journals, and especially the Times, have allowed themselves to make for some time past against our country, have been read here with astonishment."—London Mail.

The revolution has terminated at Hayti, and perfect tranquillity prevails. The Patriot army, consisting of 14,000 men, in two divisions, and under the command of Gens. Riviere and Lazarre, had entered Port-au-Prince; and the inhabitants had not only appointed a committee of public safety, for the maintenance of order and protection of property during the Presidential vacancy, but all parties were emulating each other in their endeavours to promote harmony and good feeling.

Accounts from Constantinople of April 12th, say, the Servian question has been this day concluded in the following terms, at a Council of Ministers held in the presence of the Russian Ambassador:—1. Karageorgewitsch must abdicate, otherwise he will be formally declared to have forfeited the government of Servia. 2. A new election for a Sovereign shall be proceeded with. 3. Riamil Pasha, Wutsitch, and Petroniewitsch must quit the Servian territory. These three resolutions resume, in a word, the terms of the ultimatum of the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh, which, supported in its views by the Austrian Cabinet, has gained an important victory over the obstinacy of the Turks, and over all those who endeavoured to defeat their plans. Under those circumstances, there is no doubt but the election will terminate in favour of Prince Milosch Obrenowitsch, father of Prince Michael, who is protected by the Emperor Nicholas.—London Mail.

SPAIN.—The opening of the Spanish Cortes took place on the 3rd inst. The Regent's Speech promises legal and political reforms, measures for the improvement of the national credit, and speaks of the communications as extending, of agriculture and industry as imparting greater activity to commerce, and public instruction as undergoing a considerable amelioration. "The laws, in harmony with the constitution, which the Government intend submitting to your examination, will contribute to improve the administration, to develop every branch of the public wealth, to raise the national militia, education, and charitable institutions, to a degree becoming the Spanish name. In the meanwhile, peace, the laws, and order reign throughout the whole monarchy." The Speech was listened to in the most profound silence, and elicited no cheers. The whole of the corps diplomatique was present. The absence of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula and his family was, however, remarked, and occasioned surprise. M. Cortina was to be the candidate of the Opposition for the Presidency of the Chamber of Deputies.—Pat.

A VERY BEAUTIFUL
ASTRONOMICAL TIME PIECE,
BY SHEARER, OF LONDON.

Who made the first of the kind for H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex.

THE above TIME PIECE is of the most elegant construction, and is so fitted with a glass case to a handsome stand, that every part of the mechanism is distinctly seen. There are two sets of dials, the one shewing mean solar time, and the other sidereal time. Connected with the Clock work are two Globes of six inches diameter; of which the Terrestrial performs a revolution in a mean solar day, so as to exhibit the various places on the Earth's surface, as they are presented to the Sun, the position of which is represented by the meridian circle: whilst the Celestial performs a revolution in a sidereal day, so as to exhibit the stars in the position in which they are in the heavens, at any hour of the day or night. There is lastly a circle placed horizontally, which revolves once a year, so as to shew the day of the month correctly.

The mechanism of the Time Piece, both in design and execution, is of the first order: and to prevent its being injured by the removal of the glass shade, there is an apparatus for winding up the works from the outside, which is entirely detached from the movement except when in the act of winding.

The Time Piece may be seen at Mr. E. Gray's, Hare Street, Calcutta.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY AND ITS FINANCES.—The stability of our Empire in India was never more clearly demonstrated than during the past year. From the Himalayu to Cape Comorin it was known that we had been ignominiously expelled from Cabul, and that a large British army had been annihilated beyond the Indus, by the tribes who had heretofore established their dominion in India. To add to our misfortunes, it was also known that our avenging army had been arrested for months at the threshold of the defiles, as if appalled by the difficulty of entering them. Yet this period of unexampled disgrace, in which we might have expected a spirit of opposition to revive among the chiefs who were depressed by our supremacy, passed away without a single hostile demonstration, except in the district of Bundlekund, and even there, in no instance have five hundred insurgents ever been able to assemble. The violence of the shock given to the prestige of our power, has only served to exhibit more clearly the strength it has acquired. It is scarcely necessary to add that our triumphant return from Cabul has served to consolidate our power, and that to all present appearance nothing is necessary to secure the tranquillity of the country for years to come, but the exercise of a little common sense and ordinary vigor in the administration of its affairs. There is of course a strong disposition in the Tory party at home, to ascribe the repose of India to the genius of the Governor General. So far as that repose has been improved by our victories in Affghanistan, and so far as Lord Ellenborough contributed by his exertions to those victories, he is entitled to share in the credit. But the health of the patient is far more to be attributed to the strength of his constitution, than to the aid of political practitioners.

But is India tranquil? Comparatively speaking, it is. In a country in which we have overturned so many interests, and created so many enemies, absolute tranquillity can scarcely be expected for a century to come. Bundlekund is in a disturbed state; but after a careful perusal of the bushel full of letters which have appeared on the subject in the papers, truth compels us to say that the insurrection, which was from the beginning insignificant—a kind of tempest in a tea pot—is far less troublesome than it was a twelvemonth ago, when people talked of putting the fort of Allahabad in a state of defence. A province comprising so large a number of independent little kings cannot be expected to exhibit the same aspect of repose as one of our own districts, where every man from the highest Zemindar to the meanest peasant is the Company's golam. To us much reflecting on the diverse letters which have appeared in the papers, the tranquillity of Bundlekund seems to be considered rather a personal than a political question. Those who believe that Col. Sleeman, who has put down Thuggee, and whose simple appointment to suppress Dacoits produced such a salutary dread on the minds of the profession generally, as to induce the most successful among them to retire beyond his jurisdiction, is not the man to tranquillize Bundlekund, and that the peace of the country cannot be established by him, believe that the country is less tranquil than ever. Those, on the contrary, who are ready to admit the idea that the combination of suavity and vigor exhibited by the Colonel is just the thing for a province, half dependent and half independent, are disposed to look with a cheerful eye on its present condition and prospects.

At Gwalior there is not peace. On the death of the old Raja, our Government recognized the adopted son as his successor, and the Mama Saib as minister. But an insurgent called the Khasgee-walla, has suddenly appeared on the stage, ignominiously expelled the Minister, and acquired possession of the treasures and the person of the young sovereign. He has overturned the administration to which we made ourselves a party, and has obliged or induced the British Resident to retire from the Court to the camp of the Contingent force. It is said that Lord Ellenborough has refused to interfere, and has directed the Resident not to return to the Court till he is invited back. This determination is traced to the tenor of the letters which his Lordship has received from England relative to the occupation of Scinde; but this we think is a far-fetched reason; a more probable cause may be discovered in the policy which his Lordship has invariably pursued in reference to all the states which stand in the same position to the British Government as that of Gwalior. That policy has been one of the most strict and jealous non-intervention. But non-interference is next to an impossibility. In this very instance of Gwalior, the expression of the Governor General's concurrence in the succession of the Sovereign, or the appointment of the Minister, was an act of intervention; and identified us in the opinion of the natives of India with the existing order of things. The present insurrection, followed as it is by the departure of our Resident, will be regarded by the people of the country, as well as by its princes, as a defiance of our authority, and it requires no seer to predict that we cannot long continue in the present state of neutrality.

In Scinde, Shere Mahomed has collected another Belochee army and we are daily expecting to hear that Sir Charles Napier has annihilated it. But the tranquillity of that province,—which by whatever means acquired, we may not, must not relinquish,—will be a work of time. Already has Sir Charles's boast that not another shot need be fired in it, been belied by the event. The warlike Belochees will not easily relinquish their hold on its fertile plains and, they must experience a succession of defeats before they can be brought to regard the recovery of it as hopeless. While the province is under a Napier, there can be little fear for the result of their efforts; but let our troops once be subjected to the same imbecility, which cost us Cabul, and another military tragedy may be exhibited on the banks of the Indus.

The Finances of India may well form an object of congratulation, as well of surprize, to those who noticed Sir R. Peel's doleful anticipations in Parliament last year. It will not be forgotten how the Premier, when enforcing the necessity of an Income Tax, availed himself of the disorganization of the finances of India, though he never intended that a farthing of that tax should be applied to their relief. "Bear in mind," said Sir Robert, "the probable demand I may have to make for the increase of the military or naval establishments of the country having regard to the position of affairs in the East"—"I am sorry to say that Indian finance offers no consolation for the state of the finance in this country." He described the deficiency of the next year as independently of the increase to be expected on account of China, and Affghanistan. On the 23d of March he enforced on the House the "obligation of being prepared with money in hand to maintain the failing credit of the Company"—"You do not believe perhaps that the financial difficulties of India will recoil on you; but if you think so, I shall convince you that the time is approaching, when you will know by experience that such a position cannot be maintained."—"Look at the war in India and China.—We have to send six Regiments to India in order to maintain the honour and power of this country." The Edinburgh Review, from which these extracts have been made, insinuates that these statements were intended to mystify an assembly notoriously ignorant of the real condition of the revenue and finances of India. Others, more considerate, have attributed them to a real dread on the mind of the Premier that our financial system would break down. Perhaps there was a mixture of both motives. A single year however has been sufficient to dispel these gloomy forebodings and to demonstrate the elasticity of our Indian revenue; and we can now smile at the idea of England's coming to the rescue of the Company's failing credit. The Company Bahadoor's credit was as firm as ever even at the most serious period of the late crisis. If the five per cent. loan was not filled up with rapidity, it arose from an impression that the Indian Government would want millions more to maintain its authority beyond the Indus and would be constrained to open a new loan at six per cent. The current of subscriptions ebbed and flowed according to the reports of our intention to abandon or retain the country. When it became certain that our victorious army was actually on its return, Government was so overwhelmed with payments into the loan, as to be obliged, in its own defence, to close it. The fact is, that the embarrassments of the Indian treasury arose from no permanent increase of establishments, and no interruption of the established sources of revenue, but simply from the vast sums required for operations beyond the Indus. As soon as this drain ceased, our finances resumed their usual appearance of health and vigor.

Of this fact the present value of the public securities may be adduced as a proof. The old five per cents, are at a sickly premium of nine or ten annas per cent; while the last loan bears a premium of between three and four Rupees per cent. On enquiring into the cause of this difference in the market price of securities of the same value, we find it arises from a report that the Treasury vaults are choked up with money; and that the idle funds in it amount to two millions sterling. The report appears to us to be not far from the truth. This has given rise to an impression that Government intended to commence paying off its loans, and that the old five per cents would be the first victims. Assuming these facts to be correct, we find that instead of Sir Robert Peel's being "obliged to prepare himself with money in hand to maintain the failing credit of the Company," within seven months after the last detachment of our troops had crossed the Indus, though there has been no retrenchment of domestic expenditure even to the extent of 50,000£ a year, and though we have been called to provide the ways and means for conquering a kingdom, as large as Portugal and as fertile as Egypt, the accumulation of funds in the Treasury amounts, according to probable report, to the sum of Two Millions Sterling; and that three years will be sufficient to pay off all the pecuniary obligations incurred by the Affghan war—without the imposition of any property tax in India.

Mr. Thomas Sidney Smith and the Libel Case.—A very singular case of Libel has just been tried at Bombay, which has ended in the Court's awarding damages to the extent of 500 Rupees against the Editor of the Bombay Times.

Mr. Thomas Sidney Smith, a barrister of the Supreme Court at Madras, went down to Hydrabad, in the dominions of the Nizam, about the end of 1840, where a number of Natives who were dissatisfied with the Resident and the British authorities there, resorted to him and placed their cases in his hands. On all such occasions when a European gentleman makes his appearance at any station, receiving complaints and collecting evidence against those whom the natives have been accustomed to regard with respect, the whole frame of society becomes unhinged, and heats and animosities are generated, in which it is difficult for either party to keep its temper. A series of articles appeared in the Englishman simultaneously with Mr. Smith's advent at Hydrabad, in which the conduct of some of the British authorities in the Nizam's territories was attacked with extreme severity. These articles were generally understood to have been one of the consequences of Mr. Smith's residence at Hydrabad; and some even went so far as to attribute them to his pen, but of this there is no evidence.

Some gentleman in the Deccan, roused by these attacks on the British authorities, took up their defence under the signature of Ryut, and sent two letters to us, forwarding copies of them at the same time to the Editor of the Bombay Times, but forgetting to alter the address. Of these letters we published the first; the second contained a personal insinuation, of the truth of which we had no evidence; and we declined inserting it. It appeared however in the Bombay Times of the 24th of March 1841, as a letter addressed to the Friend of India. Mr. Smith, fancying that it had appeared originally in our columns, sent us a reply to it, with an anonymous signature, which to the best of our recollection was in type, and appeared to have been carefully revised. It was accompanied with a letter from him under his own signature, in which he said that it "would be easy to name noblemen who were his relatives or members of Parliament who were his friends," and at the same time insinuated that we were actuated by base motives in our readiness to aid in defending the servants of Government. He also used other expressions which were intended to be very cutting. This virulent attack on us for a communication we had never published, served only to create a smile at the thought that so much indignation should be wasted. At the same time he sent a copy of his reply, which was signed Anti Humbug to the Bombay Times.

The libel on which Mr. Smith founds his action against the Times is contained in these words. Ryut said, "a Native friend of mine, who occasionally consults me regarding his affairs, told me he had just had a very large Nuzzerana unjustly taken from him by the Nizam's Government, and that he intended going to Hydrabad to pay and get the Chota Lawyer Saheb to write a petition for him, and forward it through his relation the Lord Burra Governor Saheb in Calcutta to his (Mr. S's.) dost Ameers in Parliament, and before the Queen.—If Mr. Smith made his fortune—(70,000 Rs. through writing petitions) by such imposition, and Capt. Malcolm was aware of it, I cannot think the Assistant Resident, in pressing his being returned to Madras, recommended any thing out of the way."

Now it appears very singular that Mr. Thomas Sidney Smith, whose character and honor are said to have been so deeply compromized by this charge, should have slept on the dishonor for eighteen months, and then have brought an action against the publisher, when the original letter, together with all hope of reference to the writer, was lost.

It appears very singular that Mr. Smith having engaged in a newspaper controversy with Ryut, having in his reply to the letter now deemed calumnious made no allusion to the stain cast on his honour, and having moreover encouraged Ryut to continue the controversy, by saying, "I am really glad he has taken the field so boldly and I promise to discuss every point with him," should, at the end of eighteen months, ground an action for damages on a paragraph in that same letter of which he had extolled the boldness.

It is singular that Mr. Smith, after having vindicated his character in the public papers, at the time, from this charge, by using the strongest term a gentleman can adopt, and designated it as a lie, should consider it necessary to seek a farther vindication of his character, after so long a period, in a Court of law.

It is singular that Mr. Smith, having in his letter to us called Ryut a "mean liar," and a "sneaking calumniator," should bring an action for the falsehood and calumny which he supposed to have been charged on himself.

It is singular that Mr. Smith, considers himself injured by Ryut's having said that a native had told him how he, Mr. Smith, obtained money by imposing on the Hydrabad natives with the assertion that he was a relative of the Governor General, while in his letter in reply to Ryut he brought a still more offensive accusation against another individual, Mr. Dighton, by stating that he had been charged with swindling to the extent of a lakh and a half of Rupees. It is singular that an individual smarting under what he considers a charge of "swindling," should turn round and charge others with the same crime, and eighteen months after drag his accuser, or rather the Editor who was the innocent instrument of publishing the accusation, before a tribunal, and demand heavy damages for the loss of his own character.

But the Judge's charges are still more singular, and we must give them a separate article next week.

Coal.—We publish among our advertisements a notice regarding the Coal obtained from the Palamow beds, which we are informed can now be delivered at Dinapore at a less cost than Coal brought up by a circuitous route from the, miscalled, Burdwan field. We have been favoured with some particulars respecting this Coal, which may not be uninteresting to the reader.

Major Sage, who was employed by Government in 1830, in examining the coal measures in that part of the country, and who succeeded in conveying about 4,000 maunds to Dinapore at an expense of about 16,000 Rupees, which was not found to be adapted for the Steamers, says—Vide the Coal Committee's Report—"Nor am I of opinion that there is at present either capital or energy sufficient in India for individual enterprizes of such magnitude." He recommended Government to connect the Coyle, the Gorassan, and the Gungary river with the head of the great Pompon, &c. but as this would have involved an expenditure of between 20 and 30 lakhs of Rupees, Government did not follow this advice. Perhaps the difficulties were somewhat overrated by him; though the success which has now attended the enterprize has not been obtained without serious obstacles. One great difficulty is presented by a range of rocks four or five miles in length, through which the channel for boats is in some parts only 20 or 30 feet wide. The boatmen refused to transport the coal from the Coyle to the Soane for less than 30 Rupees the 100 maunds, but it has been accomplished for a less sum by the construction of boats by the enterprizing individual who now offers the coal to the public. The coal did not reach Dinapore in 1841, at a less cost than 4 Rupees a maund. Last year, the expense was reduced, and coal reached the point of delivery at one Rupee, two annas. Greater facilites have now been created, and in the present year the charge will be farther reduced. He expects in the course of time to be able to supply it at 7 or 8 annas the maund. Government now pay, as we are informed, 82 Rs. 10 annas the hundred maunds; or 13 annas 1½ pie per maund, on the whole line from Calcutta to Allahabad.

Should this enterprize succeed, and good coal be delivered from these mines at 8 annas the maund at Dinapore, the progress of Inland steam navigation will be greatly facilitated. The expense of fuel forms one of the most serious items, and until the cost of it can be reduced, by the acquisition of coal from localities in the more immediate vicinity of the great towns on the line of communication, every other retrenchment will be comparatively useless. It is, we believe, mainly to be attributed to the high price of coal that this enterprize has not made any progress during the last eight years.

We fear, however, that unless a larger field for the consumption of coal can be created, or unless coal of a character resembling that obtained from England, can be discovered, those who are engaged in working the mines in different parts of the country will suffer serious loss. The Burdwan coal has been found too inferior to be of much use in sea going steamers. The Hindoostan steamer is understood to have been unable to make more than eight knots and a half an hour, in the first trip to Suez, so long as the country coal was used, whereas when supplied with the English coal taken in at Galle, she attained a speed of nearly ten knots. Capt. Engledue, it is said, will look at nothing but English coal. Meanwhile those who have opened coal mines are labouring to increase the supply, and it is expected that in the present season it will fall little short of two millions of maunds, while the demand continues almost stationary at twelve hundred thousand.

EXACTIONS AT VIZAGAPATAM.—We have been requested to give publicity to the following statement of exactions levied on the poor Natives at Vizagapatam, by certain influential and orthodox Natives at that place, for the support of the Hindoo religion. It appears somewhat singular that assessments so illegal should have been allowed to exist for any length of time under the eye of the European authorities; but it does sometimes happen that the European officer is unconscious of every thing that is not brought officially before him. Be that as it may, the fact that such exactions exist, is now publicly known, and we feel perfectly confident that the Madras Government will direct the most searching enquiry to be made on the subject, and put an immediate stop to all further demands of this nature.

THE WAY IN WHICH IDOLATRY IS SUPPORTED IN INDIA.

DEAR SIR,—In reference to this important subject I wish to relate one fact that has come to my knowledge a short time since.

The temples at Vizagapatam having fallen greatly out of repair within the last few years, and the greater part of the people caring nothing about them, a scheme was set on foot by some of the orthodox Hindus of this place for repairing and beautifying the shrines of their unclean deities. How to raise the money was the difficulty, for it takes a long time to move a Hindu's heart; and if the idolatrous shrines of this part of India were to depend only upon the voluntary offerings of the people for their support, they would soon fall to ruin. At last three of the chief men in the employ of Government at this place hit upon the following device; the owner of each bullock that entered the town with grain for sale, and the owner of every bandy load of wood, was compelled to pay two dubs for the repairs of the decayed temples. This taxing system has been going on for six months past, and though the poor ryots have been inclined to make complaint against this unjust tax, they have been kept back from so doing from fear of the influential native gentleman at the head of the scheme. This plan for the support of Hindu temples in this town is conducted by the three principal Government native servants connected with the Court and Collector's Cutchery. They have appointed peons, a gomastah (or writer) and a regular establishment to collect and disburse the money. There is little doubt that many of the poor ryots and coolies imagine that this tax is demanded by the Government, and thus the British name is disgraced, and British justice called in question, by the largest and most industrious portion of our fellow-subjects in this district.

It deserves to be mentioned that a similar tax was exacted some years ago in this place, but on being made known to the Government by the Circuit Judge, it was immediately abolished by an order from head-quarters. The sum collected in this way already amounts to upwards of 10,000 Rupees, and out of this and other resources 400 idle Brahmins are daily fed and the temples repaired.

I hope, my dear Sir, that you will take notice of this glaring piece of injustice and duly animadvert upon the same.

I remain, your's sincerely,

AN OBSERVER.

JOURNALS OF EVENTS IN AFFGHANISTAN IN THE WINTER OF 1841. LADY SALE, LIEUT. EYRE, LIEUT. MELVILLE—THE FATAL RETREAT.—The tragic death of Sir William Macnaghten was not positively known in the cantonments till the day after the event, the 24th December, when letters from Captains Lawrence and Conolly to Ladies Sale and Macnaghten informed them of the assassination. It was however evidently seen from the Camp that Sir William had fallen a victim to Affghan treachery, and had been either murdered or captured. The troops stood to their arms and manned the walls, but not a single effort was made to rescue or revenge their leader. The Ghazees were seen from the walls to strip the body of a European in the very spot where the Envoy had met the chiefs, and it was afterwards ascertained that this was the body of the Envoy, which might have been recovered by a single charge of cavalry, but not a movement was made. The loss of the Envoy created a deep sensation in the Camp, and the troops were ardent for action, but nothing could break up the apathy of the Commanders. All that General Elphinstone did was to send Capt. Grant to the head of each regiment to assure the troops that the conference had been disturbed by some Ghazees, that Sir William was safe, and was in Sheriff's fort, and would soon return. As the General was known to have received no intelligence to warrant such an assertion, it was of course received with little confidence.

The confusion in the City was great. The murder of the Envoy and of Capt. Trevor, and the capture of Capts. Lawrence and Mackenzie soon became known. The Affghans seem to have been terrified at the boldness and success of their treachery. They fancied that there was some British spirit left in the cantonments, and reckoned upon being instantly attacked by an infuriated body of our troops. But their fears were idle. Lieut. Melville observes that, considering the excitement of the troops and the apprehensions of the enemy, an attack on the city might, even at that time, have been successful, and have turned the scale in our favour. Under favour of this success, we might have made good our way to the Bala Hissar, and there held out till summer. "We attack the city," says the writer with the deepest feeling of scorn: "We had seen our Political Agent murdered, our magazine taken, our troops defeated, and had not attacked it; why should we attack it? No, no, it was our fate again to allow ourselves to be ensnared in their miserable treaties, and, vacillating to the last, to fall victims in the end to their treachery, and seal with the blood of a hundred officers, and 12,000 men, including camp followers, the work so inauspiciously begun."

On the 24th, the Affghan chiefs sent in the treaty with some important alterations; and at the same time attributed the murder of the Envoy to his breach of faith—as if they themselves had not violated every item of the treaty! The new terms were that all our guns, except six, and all our treasure should be given up, and that all the married men with their wives and children should be exchanged for the hostages now in their hands. General Elphinstone, on receiving this communication, requested Major Pottinger to assume the office of Political Agent, and though that officer was suffering severely from his wound, and incapacitated for active bodily exertion, he had too much public spirit to decline the office. On the 26th., the Naib Ameer arrived in the camp, to obtain the ratification of the treaty. It appears that Sir W. Macnaghten had engaged to pay the Chiefs fourteen lakhs of Rupees, on the safe arrival of the army at Peshawur. They now insisted that this sum should be paid down before the army moved out of cantonments, by bills drawn on the Indian Government, which the bankers of Cabul were ready to cash. Major Pottinger was exceedingly averse to the payment of this money, or indeed to any treaty at all. He knew the Affghan character too well to put any confidence in the promises of the Chiefs. Even at this, the eleventh hour, he proposed to hold out at Cabul, or to force an immediate retreat to Jellalabad. But we must give the whole passage from Eyre:

"Major Pottinger being altogether averse from the payment of this money, and indeed strongly opposed to any treaty binding the Indian Government to a course of policy, which it might find inconvenient to adopt, a council of war was convened by the General, consisting of himself, Brigadiers Shelton and Anquetil, Col. Chambers, Capt. Bellew, Assist. Qr.-Mast.-Gen., and Capt. Grant, Assist. Adjt.-Gen. In the presence of this council, Major Pottinger declared his conviction that no confidence could be placed in any treaty formed with the Affghan chiefs; that, under such circumstances, to bind the hands of government, by promising to evacuate the country, and to restore the deposed Ameer, and to waste moreover so much public money, merely to save our own lives and property, would be inconsistent with the duty we owed our country and the government we served; and that the only honourable course would be either to hold out to the last at Cabul, or to force our immediate retreat to Jellalabad.

"This, however, the officers composing the council, one and all, declared to be impracticable, owing to the want of provisions, the surrender of the surrounding forts, and the insuperable difficulties of the road at the present season; they therefore deemed it preferable to pay any sum of money, rather than sacrifice the whole force in a hopeless prolongation of hostilities. It was accordingly determined, nem. con., that Major Pottinger should at once renew the negotiations which had been commenced by Sir William Macnaghten, and that the sums promised to the chiefs by that functionary previous to his murder should be paid."

On the 29th, the Naib Ameer came in from the city with Captain Lawrence and the bankers, and the bills were drawn out, signed and delivered. The sum thus negotiated amounted to fourteen lakhs of Rupees, of which Ameenoolla, the head of the conspiracy, was to receive six. It was distinctly explained to the bankers and Affghans by Captain Lawrence that the bills would not be honoured unless the army arrived in safety at Peshawur; and that they would be of no value except this fact was certified under the hand of one of the Political Officers at that place. The same fact is understood to have been proclaimed in the city by Capt. Conolly. That the conditions of payment were never fulfilled, is as certain as that the Chiefs never intended to fulfil them. The bills were very properly dishonoured by our Government, and it is some consolation, amidst the dreary reflections to which this campaign gives birth, to know that with the exception of 50 or 60,000 Rupees, which the Chiefs contrived to squeeze out of the bankers, they never derived any benefit from the bills. Four officers were given up as hostages. Three of the Shah's guns were made over during the day, together with the greater part of the treasure, to the evident disgust of the soldiers. The sick and wounded were sent into the city, but the very camels and doolies which conveyed them were plundered on their return; so admirably did the Affghan Chiefs keep their engagements with us, before the retreat commenced.

Those Chiefs had now gained all they had demanded. The forts around the cantonments had been delivered up; the guns and ammunition made over to them. They had obtained possession of nearly all the treasure in the camp. They had received Bills for fourteen lakhs of Rupees on the Indian Treasury, and the Envoy was no longer in existence. They had gradually reduced this noble British army to a state of complete helplessness. It remained now for them to fulfil their part of the contract; to supply the troops with provisions, to furnish them with cattle, and escort them in safety to Peshawur. They did nothing. They sent in no provisions, no cattle, no escort; they put off the departure of the crippled forces from day to day, that the murderous Ghilzies might have time to occupy the passes and extinguish the army. Of this the inmates of the Camp received repeated warning. They were told that the Chiefs, never intended to keep faith with them, and that it was their intention to obtain possession of the ladies, and to put every man, save one, to death.

"At length," says Lieut. Eyre, the fatal morning of the 6th of January dawned which was to witness the departure of the Cabul force from the cantonments in which they had sustained a two month's siege, to encounter the miseries of a winter march though a country of perhaps unparalleled difficulty....Deep snow covered every inch of mountain and plain with one unspotted sheet of dazzling white." It lay a foot deep on the ground and the thermometer was below freezing point. There was no appearance of the promised escort, though 40,000 Rupees, over and above the fourteen lakhs and the treasure which was surrendered, had been paid for 2000 men. After the advance had proceeded above a mile, an order was brought from Zeman Shah Khan to return to cantonments as the Chiefs were not ready; but this was no longer possible. The strength of the force on quitting Cabul to pursue its dreary journey to Jellalabad, —which only one individual reached,—consisted of 690 Europeans, 970 cavalry, and 2840 foot; altogether about 4500 fighting men. The camp was crowded with nearly 12,000 followers. From the state of the weather, the condition of the troops and the disposition of the enemy, it was manifest that the safety of the army depended entirely on its pushing forward rapidly through the terrific defiles, and reaching the valley of Jellalabad, in the shortest possible time. Had there been a master mind at the head of the army, the retreat might have been accomplished with comparatively small loss and some little renown. But, had there been such an individual at the helm, there would have been no retreat at all; by the 6th of January, the troops, instead of turning out of cantonments to perish on the mountains, would have been safely cantoned in the Bala Hissar. The troops started from the cantonments in military order, with an advance guard, a main column and a rear guard; but many precious hours were lost in passing the mass of troops and baggage across a narrow bridge, thrown up for the occasion, over the narrow river, while there was a ford a little above it. Thus the opportunity of pushing on through the Khoord Cabul the first day, at all risks, which the few friends we had among the Affghans, had so strenuously advised, was lost. The advance halted at 4 P. M. Previously to leaving the cantonments, Lady Sale picked up from among the books which were about to be abandoned, a volume of Campbell's Poems, which opened, alas, too prophetically! at those well known lines:

> "Few, few shall part where many meet,
> The snow shall be their winding sheet;
> And every turf beneath their feet
> Shall be a soldier's sepulchre."

The rear guard did not leave cantonments till near dusk; they were fired upon incessantly. As the cantonments were left by our troops, they were filled with infuriated fanatics thirsting for blood and plunder. As the evening advanced they set fire to the cantonments. "The night," says Lieut. Melville, "was dark and murky, while the columns of lurid smoke and flame, from the Envoy and General's houses, both burning, ascended high into the heavens, and throwing a red glow around, caused the thousands of Affghan banditti in the vicinity to resemble fiends at their orgies; while the faint moans of the dying, the louder cries of the wounded, and the harsh and exulting shouts of the Ghazees added to the effect. On every side lay women and children, dying from the cold, or wounded wretches wishing for the death which came not."

The rear guard was so long in clearing the cantonments that it did not get up to the encampment till two in the morning, when it was found that all order was already at an end. "The tents had been pitched without the slightest regard to regularity, those of different regiments being huddled together in one intricate mass, mixed up with baggage, camp followers, camels and horses in a way which beggars all description." Thousands of poor fellows were obliged to lie down on the bare snow without shelter, fire, or food.

On the 7th January, the second day of the retreat, the force broke up from Begramee, at 8 A. M. without the faintest semblance of that regularity or discipline on which depended the only hope of safety. The Shah's 6th Infantry was no where to be found. It had wisely dispersed and returned to Cabul. As the troops moved on, they were attacked by the enemy, who dashed down and captured the mountain train consisting of three guns. "Their recapture might have been effected, if the soldiers could have been prevailed on to make the attempt, a gallant example being shewn them by Lieut. Green and his few artillery men, who made a sudden charge upon the foe, but being unsupported, was obliged to abandon the guns and spike them. Soon after the enemy charged down and captured a large quantity of baggage. The original intention of the General on starting from Begramee was to pass on at once through the Khoord Cabul, which would probably have saved half the force. But on arriving at Bootkhak, Capt. Skinner fell in with a follower of Akhbar Khan, who said that his master was encamped at some little distance. Skinner was sent to him on the part of the General, and Akhbar stated that he had come on the part of the chiefs to escort the troops to Jellalabad. He had six hundred horsemen with him. He said we had been attacked because we had left the cantonments contrary to the wishes of the chiefs! He insisted on the army's halting at Bootkhak, at the mouth of the Khoord Cabul Pass till the next morning, in which case he promised to provide food, forage, and firewood for the troops. He said he should expect hostages to be given up to insure our not marching beyond Tezeen, till tidings should be received of the evacuation of Jellalabad. The infatuated General, never reflecting for a moment that it was physically impossible for Akbar to supply food and firewood for that host, listened to the treacherous foe, and ordered the army to halt. "Thus," says Lieut. Melville, "the Sirdar had gained his point. Instead of making the forced marches we intended, and which would have carried us at once both out of the snow and the power of the enemy, we allowed ourselves to be outmanœuvred by this politic barbarian, and halted at the mouth of the passes till they should be occupied and barricaded by the Ghilzie force. Thus the general played into the enemy's hand and sealed the doom of thousands." The soldiers, exhausted by fatigue, cold and hunger, lay down at once on the snow, which was to many a grave and a winding sheet. Lady Sale says, that scarcely any baggage remained. In a small pall of Johnson's they slept nine, all touching each other; their only food consisted of a few Cabul cakes and some tea.

On the morning of the 8th the troops had no sooner started than the enemy opened a heavy fire on them. Major Thain, putting himself at the head of the 44th, led them on boldly to the attack, and they behaved with a resolution and gallantry worthy of British soldiers. Akbar Khan was in the neighbourhood. Capt. Skinner was sent to communicate with him, and he demanded that Major Pottinger and Capts. Lawrence and Mackenzie should be given up, which was no sooner done, than hostilities ceased! Just after this conference and the surrender of the officers, a note arrived from Capt. Conolly to Capt. Lawrence, telling him to be cautious how he put himself into Akbar Khan's power, and above all things to push on. "Once more," says Lieut. Eyre, "this living mass of men and animals moved on."..." The idea of threading the stupendous pass before us, in the face of an armed tribe of blood thirsty barbarians, with such a dense irregular multitude, was frightful. and the spectacle then presented by that waving sea of animated beings, the majority of whom a few fleeting hours would transform into a line of lifeless carcases, can never be forgotten by those who witnessed it."

The Khoord Cabul defile is five miles from one end to the other, shut in on either hand by a line of lofty hills. Down the centre dashed an impetuous torrent, which the troops were required to cross and recross twenty-eight times. Through the whole passage the enemy kept up a fearful discharge from their unerring jezails. Some Affghan chiefs rode with the advance, and desired their followers to shout to the Ghilzies to cease firing, but in vain. They ran the same risk with the British soldiers, and their sincerity on this occasion, is beyond suspicion. The ladies were exposed to the most eminent danger. Lady Sale received a ball in her wrist. On one camel were Mrs. Boyd and her youngest boy in one kujava; in the other, Mrs. Mainwaring, her infant of three months, and Mrs. Anderson's child. The camel was shot. Mrs. Boyd obtained a horse; her child was put on another behind a man who was shot, and the child lost. Mrs. Anderson's child was carried off in the confusion. Meeting a poney laden with treasure, Mrs. Mainwaring mounted it, but it upset, and with her infant in her arms she hurried forward on foot through the deep snow, picking her way over the bodies of the dead, dying and wounded men and cattle, the enemy keeping up a sharp fire, and several being killed beside her—but she reached the camp in safety. About the centre of the pass the slaughter was terrific; the panic became general, and each one rushed forward to get through the defile, regardless of all around him. The rear guard suffered severely, and at length, finding that delay was only destruction, the troops which composed it followed the general example, and made the best of their way to the front.

Here fell Capt. Sturt, mortally wounded with a blow from an Affghan knife in the abdomen. After seeing Lady Sale and his wife lodged in comparative safety, he returned through the defile. Lady Sale says that he saw Major Thain's horse wounded, and went back, she believes, in search of the Major. We are happy to find, that this report was believed by any one, for it was generally understood among the captives that he went back in search of a goodree. On hearing that he was wounded, Lieut. Mein, of H. M. 13th, went in search of him through the pass, at the eminent risk of his own life, and finding him unable to move, placed him on a quilt, (perhaps the goodree,) and with the aid of Sergeant Deane, drew him through the snow, while the enemy were dealing death around, and restored him to his relatives. This act of heroic friendship attracted the notice of Sir Robert Peel, who in the speech in which he moved the thanks of the House to the troops, and commemorated the deeds of those who had so nobly upheld the reputation of their country in scenes of unexampled danger, singled out the name of Mein, and presented it to the applause of the Commons. How does it happen then, that Lady Sale, so much more deeply interested in the transaction, should pass over in ungrateful silence, such an act of devotion to that son-in-law, in whom her soul was wrapped up, and with whose praises her book is filled? It is scarcely possible to suppose that the journal originally contained no affectionate record of her gratitude. It is still less possible to suppose that any subsequent alienation could have induced her to obliterate it. It is an omission highly injurious to the character both of the book and its author. But though this act of the gallant youth has not been deemed worthy of notice in her Ladyship's pages, he may be amply consoled by the recollection, that it will be preserved from oblivion in a far more important and permanent memorial, the records of the Parliament of Great Britain.

Three thousand men perished in this day's march. The survivors, on arriving at the table land of the Khoord Cabul, found themselves in a still colder climate than that they had left. The snow began to fall on their arrival and continued to fall till morning. Only four tents had been saved, of which one belonged to the General, two were devoted to the ladies, and one was given up to the sick. It is marvellous that any survived that dreary fearful night.

"The morning of the 9th dawned, awakening thousands to increased misery. Many a wretched survivor cast looks of envy at his comrade in the quiet sleep of death. This morning Capt. Sturt died of the wound received the preceding day, and he alone of the multitude who left Cabul and perished in those mountains, received Christian burial. The General had ordered the march at 10 A. M. but two hours previously, a large portion of the troops, with nearly all the camp followers had moved on. Before 10, a message came from Mahomed Akbar strongly recommending that the troops should halt for the day, when he would use every effort to procure supplies. "In a bleak barren mountainous country, our enemy promises supplies, and is believed!" One day more; this day, the 9th, would have carried the troops almost out of the reach of snow. Yet the enemy who had lured the troops on, and planned their destruction, persuades the General to halt the troops for another day and another night, in the deepest snow, on the highest table land in the vicinity of Cabul, and he halted! In the course of the day Akhbar Khan sent over a very gracious message to say that the camp was not a place for ladies and children, and that he would take charge of them, if they would place themselves under his protection, and conduct them safe to Jellalabad. Lieut. Eyre's description of the hardships to which they had been exposed will easily account for their preference of captivity with a faithless foe, to an excruciating death. The ladies were accordingly sent over with their husbands and children on the noon of the 9th.

Akhbar Khan had thus gained one of the points for which he had so long been labouring. He had obtained three hostages and had now possession of all the married women. One half the force was annihilated. It only remained to annihilate the other half, and to obtain the persons of the General and the Brigadier. He had promised to secure a safe retreat for the troops, and to supply them with provisions. Of provisions he never sent in so much as a grain. The protection he afforded was apparent the moment the troops left their encampment at Khoord Cabul, on the morning of the 10th. The camp had no sooner broken up than every man who from frost and wounds could not be removed, was massacred, almost before the eyes of the retiring troops. On leaving the encampment, the enemy rushed furiously on our troops. The Shah's 2d Cavalry was ordered to charge; they rode up to the enemy—and joined them, and then turned round on their own officers! A couple of miles from the last bivouac the troops came to a narrow gorge between the precipitous spurs of two hills. At this point the Affghans had prepared to receive them. As the column defiled through it, these men perched securely on the ridges, poured a murderous fire on the troops. Fresh numbers fell at every volley, and the gorge was choked up with the dead and dying. The sepoys seeing no escape and driven to desperation, cast away their arms and accoutrements and fled on for their lives. The Affghans rushed down with their knives and butchered them without mercy. Here the last remnants of the Native Regiments were scattered and destroyed; and the public treasure and the remaining baggage fell into the hands of the enemy. The advance pushed on to Kubbur-i-Jubber, five miles a-head and halted to enable the rear to join. They waited long, but in vain; a few stragglers came up one after another, and then the astounding truth flashed on their minds that nearly the whole of the main and rear columns had been cut off, and that of all who had left the table land of the Khoord Cabul that morning, they were the only survivors—that is to say, 50 horse artillery men with one twelve-pound howitzer, 70 files of H. M. 44th and 150 Cavalry troopers. But the Camp followers were still numerous.

A party of Affghan horse now approached, and they turned out to be part of Akhbar Khan's escort. He seems always to have presented himself, after every fresh slaughter of our troops. Capt. Skinner was sent to remonstrate with him on this new attack, and his reply was that he could not control the Ghilzies; but that if the General would surrender himself and all the Europeans, unarmed, and leave all the camp followers to be butchered by the enemy, he would give them a safe conduct to Jellalabad. To this proposal the General refused his compliance, and the small remnant marched on five miles farther to Tazeen, attacked all the way by the murderous Ghilzies. They reached it at 4 P. M. on the 10th. This was the fifth day after leaving Cabul, and during this period, hunger and thirst, the sword and the snow had done its work on that unfortunate army with such fearful efficacy, as to leave only 4,000 men out of 16,000 who had quitted the city. The good Samaritan was again in their vicinity at Tazeen also, and the General, though perfectly aware of his inability or unwillingness to arrest these attacks, sent Capt. Skinner to renew negotiations. The answer was again the same. Surrender yourselves unarmed, and leave the Camp followers to the tender mercies of the Ghilzies, and I will protect you. To this proposal the General could not in honour accede, and it was resolved, famished, frost bitten and exhausted as the troops were, to make an effort to reach Jugdulluk, twenty-two miles distant, under cover of the night, and if possible to get through that terrific defile before the enemy could occupy it. At 7 P. M. the troops began their dismal march, leaving Dr. Cardew, who had been severely wounded, lashed to their last gun; which they were obliged to abandon. The Ghilzies soon put an end to his misery. At 8 A. M. of the 11th they had only been able to reach Kutteh Sung, and Jugdulluk was yet ten miles off. The murderous Ghilzies were now on the alert and began to crown the heights. The progress of the troops was one continual conflict. Brigadier Shelton, with his brave little band in the rear, holding overwhelming numbers in check, literally performed wonders. Alas, that the first day of the insurrection had not been distinguished by a similar display of the Brigadier's valor; we should not then have had this record of unparalleled disasters.

They arrived at Jugdulluk at 2 P. M. of the 11th, having been thirty hours without food, drink or rest, exposed to the incessant attacks of the enemy. The rear was still struggling gallantly, followed at every step by its merciless foe. To cheer them on the General called twenty of the officers, to form and shew a bold front. Arriving at Jugdulluk, the men took shelter within some ruined walls. They were nearly maddened with hunger and thirst. A tempting stream of clear water ran in the front, about 150 yards from them, but no man could venture down without the certainty of being shot. Three bullocks were found with the remnant of the force; and they were slaughtered and eaten raw. Akhbar had again dogged our troops and was at Jugdulluk as soon as they were. He sent a message to Capt. Skinner to come to him, and he went over to the enemy's camp at half past three. No sooner had he taken his departure than the mountaineers began to pour their fatal vollies into the enclosed walls; but twenty gallant soldiers of the 44th drove them from their position. At five, Skinner returned with a message that if the General, the Brigadier, and Capt. Johnson would come to a conference, Akbar Khan would engage to put a stop to further annoyance, and give the troops food. Confiding in the punic faith of the Affghan, they proceeded to his camp, where they were received with kindness, and supplied with meat, drink and fuel. Akbar Khan promised the next morning to make an arrangement with the chiefs for the salvation of the few who remained. He had now fully accomplished his object. He had obtained possession of the ladies and married men, and of the General and the Brigadier, and the army was reduced to Three Hundred fighting men.

This small band remained in deep anxiety during the night of the 11th, looking out for the return of their chiefs, who came not. Suffice it to say, that notwithstanding every remonstrance on their part, Akbar Khan would not allow them to move; they were his prisoners. On the morning of the 12th, numerous Ghilzie chiefs flocked into Akbar's tent to pay their homage to him, and a conference took place, which the three British officers attended. The Ghilzies expressed the utmost hatred of the English race, and seemed to exult in the prospect of cutting the throats of the few who survived. On receiving a hint from Akbar Khan, they changed their language from Persian to Pushtoo, which the officers could not understand. The Sirdar, to all appearance, endeavoured to calm them. It was at length agreed that two lakhs of Rupees should be given them to ensure the safety of the troops, and Mahomed Shah Khan went out to make the proposal. At 12, the Sirdar himself proceeded to a hill in the rear of the British bivouac. Repeated enquiries were made when Mahomed Shah Khan would be back; and the General was always told, immediately. Frequent assurances were given him that the troops had been positively supplied with food and water. At sunset, Akbar Khan returned, and was soon followed by Mahomed Shah, who brought the intelligence that every thing was finally and amicably arranged for the safe conduct of the troops to Jellalabad. The Sirdar said he would accompany them the next morning. Suddenly the sound of musquetry was heard down the valley, and a report was brought that the Europeans were marching off, pursued by the Ghilzies. At first the Sirdar proposed that the officers should follow him. In a few moments he changed his mind, saying that if he did so, the whole horde of Ghilzies would follow him. He then agreed to start at midnight, and then changed the hour to day light.

What in the mean time occurred in the encampment where the few troops and officers who remained, had been treacherously deprived of their commanders? During this day, the 12th, they had been exposed to a constant fire from the enemy. In the morning Major Thain and Capt. Skinner rode out towards a party of horsemen, when Ser Bullund Khan, an influential chief, rode up to them and passing by the Major, mortally wounded Capt. Skinner, who was taken to the encampment and died at three in the afternoon. While he was in the agonies of death, the enemy renewed their charge. The broken walls behind which our troops had taken up their position, were completely surrounded by one in the afternoon, and hundreds of rifles poured in their murderous charges from every side. "The artillery men, those few that remained, formed in the ranks of the 44th, and gallantly supported on foot that deathless reputation they had gained when urging their daring steeds into battle." At two, P. M. the last charge was made with great and melancholy loss. A party of the 44th now took up a position on a small hill commanding the approach to the fort, which kept the enemy at bay; "the ground being completely covered with the bodies of the dead and dying was a fearful sight; soldiers taking the last words of some favourite comrade, which they were never fated to convey, while dying officers gave their few papers to a friend, who a few short hours afterwards was doomed to lie on the same bloody field himself." Some ponies were killed this day and eaten raw, while water was only procured at the risk of the men's lives. As no communication was received from the General, who had now been detained twenty-four hours, it was resolved to retreat under cover of the night, and to endeavour to pass the terrific defile of Jugdulluk.

At nine in the evening, this final, destructive but inevitable step was taken. The sick and wounded were necessarily left on the ground to be massacred. The confusion was great. The Ghilzies rushed down with their fearful knives, and the last shadow of discipline disappeared. Each one rushed into the roads and pushed forward. On nearing the summit of the pass, it was found to be blocked up with felled trees, which formed a barrier six feet high. Here the Affghans waited the arrival of the small remnant of the army. A terrific fire was poured in from all quarters, and the enemy rushed in furiously upon the pent up crowd of troops and followers, "committing wholesale slaughter." Twelve officers, among whom were Brigadier Anquetil, Col. Chambers, and Major Thain fell here. At length the united efforts of men and horses forced the barrier down, and again the much decreased column pushed on. Three hundred men of all colors crossed the barrier, and pushed on towards Jellalabad. As they advanced, beacons were lighted up from hill to hill, to call the Affghans to the slaughter. At one in the morning of the 13th, the whole body of fighting men was reduced to about a hundred. At three, they arrived at the Soorkab river, the bridge of which was occupied by the enemy. Part of the troops forced it; others crossed the bitterly cold stream. The troops now became dispirited beyond the hope of revival; parties were formed who chose their own leader; and wandering toward Jellalabad, met death at the hands of the Affghans. Six of the officers who had preserved their horses pushed on for that post, but one alone of their number reached the goal of their hopes. At seven A. M. eighty men composed the whole of the remaining body. On approaching Gundamuk, the enemy pressed round them and they took refuge on a little eminence. After having been there ten minutes, a horseman approached, and waving his turban, requested a parley. Major Griffiths and Mr. Blewett, one of Capt. Johnson's writers, went with him to see what terms could be made; they were carried off to a neighbouring fort. Soon after, the enemy approached, and offered the troops some loaves, but at the same time endeavored to seize the muskets of the soldiers, who drove them down. They took up a position on a neighbouring eminence, and "marked off man after man, and officer after officer, with unerring aim." The troops after having exhausted their little ammunition began to pelt stones. At length the enemy made a final onset, and with the exception of two officers and four men, the whole body fell victims to the sanguinary mob;—and thus perished the last remains of the Cabul army.

[We shall next week conclude this lengthened notice by reviewing the period of captivity.]

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JUNE 29.

— Letters and papers have been received from Singapore to the 1st of June; but they contain no information of importance relative either to the Straits or to China. Our advices from Hong Kong do not extend beyond the 7th of May, at which date the commercial negotiations had not recommenced, in consequence of the non arrival of the new Commissioner from Pekin.

— The Star states, on the authority of letters from Bangalore, that Sir Hugh Gough was to take his departure en route to Calcutta about the present time. He may therefore be shortly expected here to assume the office of Commander-in-Chief.

— The Penang Gazette of the 1st of June mentions, that Mr. Blundell arrived there on that day from Calcutta on the Lord Amherst, and landed immediately. We have not been able as yet to obtain any farther and more certain intelligence regarding his removal by order of Government, in consequence of certain vigorous measures pursued by him at Moulmein, to resist the encroachments of the Burmese. Government must, to all appearance, have had full knowledge of all his proceedings at that settlement, before he took his departure for the Straits. If any dissatisfaction was felt in reference to those proceedings, it seems incredible that the authorities should allow him to proceed to Penang and assume the administration of the three settlements, and then send to recal him. Until, therefore, we have more satisfactory evidence of the fact, we must withhold our confidence from the report we have received. Besides Government must be fully aware that nothing is more likely to maintain peace between Tharawaddy and ourselves than a firm, and immediate resistance of any encroachments on the part of his officers.

— The Soonamooky Pinnace, in tow of the Berhampooter Steamer, arrived at Allahabad on the 20th of last month. Lord Ellenborough may therefore start for Calcutta as soon as he desires.

FRIDAY, JUNE 30.

— The Star states, that a letter from Dinagepore mentions the discovery of the tea plant near Kursiong, in the Darjeeling range, by Capt. Biddulph.

— The Sessions closed on Tuesday last, when those who had been convicted were sentenced. Eastman and his gang, who occasioned the death of Peterson, had been found guilty of manslaughter, and are sentenced to transportation for life. They will probably be sent to the Tenasserim provinces, where, under the new arrangements introduced by Major Broadfoot, they will be subjected to severe labour, befitting the nature of their crime.

— Papers were yesterday received from the Mauritius, to the 6th of the last month, which mention the total loss of the Regular, a vessel of 650 tons, bound from London to Bombay. During a heavy squall the vessel sprung a leak which gained on her and at length compelled those on board to take to the boats. The weather continued very rough, and little hopes of ultimate safety were entertained, when they were happily descried by the French frigate, la Cleopatre. They were picked up in a state of complete exhaustion and generously brought on to the Isle of France, when the Governor went in person, accompanied by his Staff, on board the French vessel of war, to return his thanks to the Captain for his generous kindness.

— The same vessels announce the wreck of the Thomas Rickinson, Capt. Newby, bound to the Mauritius with a general cargo. She struck on the reefs off Poudre d'Orton, on the morning of the 27th, the Captain supposing himself to be a degree to the eastward of the island through an error in his chronometer.

— Another wreck is announced—the third—in these Isle of France papers. The Queen Victoria, which left Bombay on the morning of the 14th of March, was wrecked on the S. W. reefs off Rodrigues on the 7th of April last. Mr. Peele, the 1st officer, Mr. Robert Plunkett, a passenger, and three seamen were lost in endeavouring to save themselves. The rest of the crew were brought in safely by H. M. French brig Colibri.

— The Raja of Ulwur, in imitation of the example of the King of Delhi, has established a Lithographic Press in his Capital for the publication of a weekly newspaper. Such is the march of intellect!

— As though commotions were not to cease in India, we now learn that considerable excitement prevails among the Soonees and Seeahs in the city of Delhi in reference to the collision between the two sects on the frontiers of Turkey and Persia. Great festivals have been given by the Sheahs in honour of the victory their brethren have gained, and the King of Lucknow has made similar demonstrations of his joy.

— There has been some trifling delay in opening the Bank at Madras, but it is pleasing to learn that it is not, as in a similar case at Bombay, attributed to the jealousy of a Bengal clique. On this occasion however it is equally placed on the wrong shoulders. It is said to arise from Lord Tweeddale's mismanagement. It arises from the absence of the Governor General from Calcutta.

— Col. Roberts left Sehwan on the 6th June to attack Shere Mahomed at Sukkurind. His force at that place is respectable, and his post is strong. Sir Charles Napier, it is understood, will simultaneously move to that point from Hydrabad. Sukkurind is on the left bank of the Indus.

— The Hurkaru states, that Baboo Prusunnocoomar Tagore has applied to be admitted as Vakeel in the Sudder Court. It is believed that the Baboo looks to the post of Government Vakeel, the very unambitious title given to the Advocate General in that Court.

SATURDAY, JULY 1.

— The Hurkaru has commenced the republication of an able article on Puseyism, which appeared in the last Edinburgh. It has not the genius exhibited in Mr. Macaulay's article on the same subject in his reply to Mr. Gladstone, but it is written with great spirit, and with a thorough knowledge of the subject. Those who have been asking what is Puseyism, which half the clergymen of the establishment are said to have embraced in the last ten years, cannot do better than peruse that article.

— A letter from China of the 7th May, the latest date yet received, appears in the Bombay papers of the 20th of June, with some particulars which have not yet appeared. The reader will remember that two vessels had been detained by the British authorities at Chusan for trading with the eastern ports contrary to orders. It is said that the big houses at Canton and Hong Kong had determined to send vessels laden with opium to those ports under American colors, and that Sir Henry Pottinger was thus constrained to release the two ships and take off the embargo. Seven ships had gone up the Yang-tse-kiang and were openly selling opium and British goods at Woosung. Trade is also brisk at Shanghae. Gold of fine touch is readily given in exchange for opium, and strange to say, the exportation of it is not forbidden like that of silver.

— The Rao Raja of Boondee, a Rajpoot chief, who was on his way to Brindabun to worship at the shrine, has been induced to return home without doing so, in consequence of the heats and animosities which have broken out between the Hindoos and Mahomedans. The Gates have fomented the dispute. Thus there may be peace in Asia, and discord in India.

— The Madras Mail sent off on the last safe day, did not reach Bombay in time for the Steamer, which has gone without them. This calamity did once occur to the Ditch letters, and mighty was our indignation; and a meeting at the Town Hall was advertized and burning speeches were rehearsed the night before to be spoken the next morning to an audience of 700, when lo and behold! Mr. Toby Prinsep, disappointed the town by publishing in the Gazette an official letter to the Bombay Government, with a severe wigging. Unfortunately the Gazette arrived before the written letter, and great was the wrath of the Bombay authorities.

MONDAY, JULY 3.

— The Hon. Mr. Maddock has been obliged to undergo the amputation of one of his thumbs, in consequence of an injury received a short time back from a deer.

— Lord Ellenborough was expected to reach the Presidency this week; but a correspondent of the Star states, that his Lordship was not to leave Allahabad before the 28th of last month, and did not expect to be in Calcutta before the 12th Instant. The following is the proposed route: Chunar the 29th, Benares the 30th June, Ghazeepore the 1st July, Buxar the 2d, Dinapore the 3d and 4th, Monghyr the 5th, Bhagulpore the 6th, Rajmahl the 7th, Berhampore the 9th, and Barrackpore the 12th July.

— The Star on Saturday last published a short Extra announcing that Col. Roberts had come up on Shah Mahomed, a brother of Shere Mahomed, by a forced march of fourteen miles, during the night, and completely surprized and routed him. The enemy made but little resistance and fled in every direction. Eighty were left dead on the field, and Shah Mahomed himself, his suite and his standards were captured. The troops under Col. Roberts were to march forward immediately to form a junction with Sir Charles Napier, by whose admirable arrangements Shere Mahomed will be completely hemmed in on all sides and prevented crossing the Indus by the armed Steamers. The large body of men collected to the north of Sukker, and who were supposed to be friendly, have turned out to be our enemies under Meer Mahomed Alee, who has been plundering a number of villages. Brigadier Paul, commanding at Sukker, had been directed not to go to such a distance from his post that he should be unable to return to it by night; but he has deemed it necessary to march out with a good force against this new enemy.

— The number of letters and covers sent by the last overland Mail which left Bombay on the 20th of June was 44,544, namely Letters 34,599 and covers 9,945.

— One John Howell has been taken in Scinde fighting against his country, and his case, which is somewhat singular, is to be referred we learn to Government. He is said to be a man about 32 or 33 years of age, a native of Islington, near London, who has been in Scinde eleven years. He sought to escape with the savings of many years to join the British army on the eve of the battle of Meanee, but was stopped by the Beloochees and obliged to point the guns during the battle. He did so in such a manner as to inflict no injury on his fellow subjects. As soon as he could, he gave himself up to Sir Charles.

— The Hurkaru states on the authority of a letter from the Himalayas, that an enormous fire broke out in the pine forest of Kussowlie, which continued to rage the whole of the 18th and 19th June.

— A very aggravated case of Crim Con has just been tried at Bombay. A Lieutenant in a Queen's Regiment has destroyed the domestic happiness of a brother officer, and the Court have awarded damages to the extent of Two Thousand Rupees, though there was nothing brought forward in mitigation of damages. If the Press were to comment on the great disproportion between the crime and the punishment, as it deserves, we suppose it would be set down as a fresh proof of its licentiousness.

— An action has been brought at Westminster by a passenger on the ship Marquis of Hastings against the Captain, for breach of contract, in not carrying an experienced Surgeon according to the terms of his advertisement. There was no surgeon on board, but a passenger who had been placed under the Captain's charge in consequence of derangement, acted as Surgeon. The Supreme Court is now employed in taking evidence under a Mandamus.

TUESDAY, JULY 4.

— From the Resolutions adopted by the Cabul Relief Fund Committee, at Kurnal, the 5th of June, we gather that the entire fund, including the subscriptions at Bombay, amounts to about three lakhs and a half of Rupees. The scheme now proposed embraces, 1st. a permanent provision for the widows of European officers and their children. It is supposed there will be ten annuitants of this class. 2dly. The widows of European non-commissioned officers, soldiers, subordinate medical officers, and all others of a similar class, and their children. The Committee suppose that the number of annuitants of this class will amount to 200. 3dly. The maimed of every description and rank, the number of whom at present is about 150, and may hereafter amount to 200.

— The confusion at Gwalior becomes greater and greater. At midnight on the 19th the usurper ordered two Regiments of Infantry, and eighteen guns to enter the Jinsey and seize all the Christian officers in camp. No opposition was offered, as the Native troops had already been brought over to his party. The Christian officers, forty in number, were captured, tied up to the guns, and unmercifully beaten. Col. Baptiste, on hearing of this, immediately ordered his camp to be fortified. He has three Regiments and eighteen guns with him; but it remains to be seen whether his men will be true to him, amidst the general defection. The Resident has left Gwalior, and gone to the encampment at Sepree. Had he called up the contingent force, or written to the British Government for troops, the insurrection would have been nipped in the bud. The Star asserts that Lord Ellenborough has determined to let matters take their own course, and has ordered the Resident not to return till he is formally recalled. If we could explain to the native princes the deep political reasons which recommend non intervention, the mischief would be mitigated; but they can and will attribute our inaction to fear alone; and the mischief of this insurrection will not therefore be confined to the territories in which it originated.

— The Coromandel, Capt. Lobban, which we thought was by this time well on towards the Cape, is at Penang! She left the Sandheads about the middle of April, but experienced very squally weather, and provisions and water soon began to run short, so that the commander was obliged to bear up for Penang, from whence a letter has been received from a passenger dated the 5th of June. Mrs. Trevor and her eight children had embarked in this vessel.

— Mr. Montriou, the barrister, who has been appointed one of the Magistrates of Calcutta, was this day sworn in as one of the Justices of the Peace. The Hurkaru says, that he will take the Native division, and Mr. Blacquiere, the Chowringee division, which seems almost as whimsical a division of labour as that which prevails among the Court of Directors in Leadenhall street. Mr. Blacquiere is the best Bengalee scholar in India, Mr. Montriou, being a stranger, cannot be supposed to know a word of the language.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 5.

— The Bombay Times of the 24th June states, that a communication had been received from Government by the Chamber of Commerce, respecting a very daring robbery which has been committed on a large quantity of treasure which was on its way from Bombay to Mendoosur, under charge of five sepoys. The party was attacked on its arrival at Chandore, on the 20th of April last, by a gang of robbers, who made off with 40,000 Rupees, after having wounded six persons, one of whom has since died. So daring an attack shews that the robbers must have been connected with a gang. If there was any plan for the suppression of robbery in that part of the country, similar to that which was organized in the North West Provinces, by Col. Sleeman, the gang would not remain long undetected.

— The Ceylon papers state on the authority of private letters from England, that the Pope had appointed the late Dean of Maynooth, named Russel, Bishop of Ceylon. and that he was about to embark for the island with ten or twelve Romish priests.

— The Carriage belonging to the Governor of Madras, which went to the bottom, between the ship and the shore had not been recovered, though divers have been employed in endeavouring to find it.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

SCINDE.

We have letters from Sehwan of the 9th, and from Sukkur of the 15th June, of which the following is a Summary. Colonel Roberts having received intelligence that Meer Shah Mahomed, a brother of Meer Shere Mahomed, had moved to the side of the river on which Shewan is situated, and encamped within 14th miles of our troops with about two thousand five hundred men, with the intention of getting the Hill tribes to join him and turn out the Faringhees, determined on attacking him before proceeding to engage Shere Mahomed himself as intimated in our last, especially as the distance allowed of his making a move during the night, with every probability of surprising the enemy's camp; the force accordingly marched at 1 A. M. of the 8th instant, and reached the enemy's camp a little after day break; on seeing the approach of Colonel Roberts's force the main body of the Belochees commenced retreating, when Captain Walter, with a troop of the 3d cavalry, pursued them and cut up about 80 men, who were left dead on the field besides a proportionate number of wounded; the light companies of the force also pursued a little distance. The guns were formed up, but the enemy became so scattered that it was useless wasting ammunition upon them, and only one shot was fired. The Commandant of the force had encamped in an old burial ground, surrounded with thorny bushes, and not being prepared to move upon our sudden approach, he took up a position under cover of the hedge with a number of followers, all of whom, together with the chief, were taken prisoners and forwarded on the evening of the 8th by steam to Hyderabad. Several letters were found on the person of the captured Meer bearing the signature of Shere Mahomed. Some guns, the number is not specified, and also standards were captured. The only misfortune on our side was in the person of Ensign Lancaster of the 20th Bombay native infantry, who received a bad sabre cut into the bone in the arm, and some 12 men were wounded; none killed. The trip was in every respect a most successful one, but we regret to say that two Europeans of Captain Blood's Battery died from the effects of the heat during their return to camp, and another died during the absence of his comrades, the heat in tents being 127 degrees. It is feared that the excitement of the temporary service over sickness to a considerable extent will declare itself. Captain Blood was to cross the river with two guns and all his horses on the 10th and to be followed on the 11th by Colonel Roberts, who would march on Sukkerind, and with the assistance of four hundred Scinde Irregular Cavalry, who had been sent in advance to co operate with his brigade try and fall in with Shere Mahomed; when he is dispersed, perhaps taken, the Bombay troops will march on Hydrabad. The next news we may expect will be the capture of the Ex-Ameer, as Sir Charles was to move out to meet him in the event of his escaping from the brigade marching from the North, and the steamers are most carefully watching the movements of the chief, changing their positions as the Ameer does his, that they may be in readiness to receive their prey.—Delhi Gazette, 24th June.

There is a report prevalent at Sukkur that a force of 5000 men with two guns is assembled either at Subzulkote, or between that place and Sukkur; they profess to be friends, but are, it is said, commanded by another brother of Shere Mahomed's. They ought certainly to be dispersed, whether enemies or professed friends, but we hear that Colonel Paul's instructions are precise not to take his force further out of Sukkur Cantonment than will enable him to return the same evening, giving him a range of 8 miles at the furthest. It is to be hoped the Belochees will not become acquainted with these instructions, as they might turn them to their own great advantage. The pickets at Sukkur seized a 6-pounder gun going through Cantonments two nights previous to the date of our last letters; the men who were with it said it belonged to Alee Morad, and were allowed to proceed.

Since writing the above we have received, by this morning's dawk, letters from Sukkur of the 16th, from which it appears that the body of men gathering to the North of Sukkur is under the command of Meer Mahomed Allee, and, so far from being intent on friendly relations, was stockading itself at a place called Gotekee, some 35 miles from Sukkur, and assuming such a position as to render it imperatively necessary on Colonel Paul to take steps for its immediate dislodgement. In order to effect this, without endangering the safety of his station, he had resolved on the morning of the 16th, although no official intimation had been given publicly up to the time of the despatch of the dawk on personally taking a strong detachment against the Meer. In consequence of this determination the Irregular horse crossed the Indus in the course of the 16th, and were to be followed on the 17th by four guns of the camel battery, with three companies, of the 9th Nat Inf., and the same number from the 10th and 55th, altogether nine companies, to be made up to their full strength. Mahomed Allee has, it is reported, been doing considerable damage to the villages North of Sukkur, burning some of them, but as the dâk communication is apparently open, we apprehend he is not on the direct road from Sukkur to Ferozepore. The dour is not likely to prove a very pleasant one under a Scinde sun, in the month of June. Some of the officers were talking of wearing turbans. A postscript adds that the camels of the battery had all been ferried over the Indus, by 5 o'clock P. M. of the 16th.—Delhi Gazette, 24th June.

To Correspondents.

The Family Domain of the Raja of Benares, next week.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Dear Sir,—Your correspondent a "Mofussil Missionary," boldly charges me with a misstatement of facts, and as this is a matter not of argument but of veracity, I trust you will do me the justice to allow me to reply to so serious an accusation.

I shall be as brief as possible, and confine myself to matters of facts, not but that there is abundance of room and provocation too, to enter the lists with my accuser; but I forbear. 1. Your correspondent enters into a history of the controversy regarding the spelling of the Saviour's name, and then calls upon your readers to compare his statement with mine, from which one would naturally infer that I had made a similar statement. Now the fact is, that I neither did nor designed to enter into a history of this matter at all, and when I had read to the end of his narrative I was really at a loss to discover what were the misstatements to which he alluded.

2. Happily however, he is afterwards more explicit, and so far as I can discover charges me distinctly with one misstatement. I said, that in regard to one version of the Scriptures, the translators and Committee were quite agreed, and in fact that the proposal came from the translators themselves. Your correspondent distinctly denies this, and says, "They (the translators) are not on the side of the Committee in the way which he represents." This is something tangible, and I repeat in opposition to it, that they are on the side of the Committee in the way in which I represented. Now then for the proof. 1. I have the evidence of my own consciousness as I was present and must therefore know more about the matter than my accuser; I give you my own proper name. 2. I appeal to the members of the Committee for the truth of my statement. 3. I appeal to the minutes of the Committee, which, to avoid the possibility of a mistake, I have just examined. In the meeting of January 17, 1843, it is stated that, it was unanimously resolved to adopt the spelling proposed. Both translators were present and voted on the occasion. 4. I appeal to the Missionary himself who is one of the translators, to whom your correspondent can apply as he is now in the Mofussil. What evidence has your correspondent to corroborate his charge? He says, "the minute of the Society tells another tale." I suppose he refers to the minute published in the Calcutta Christian Observer in February last; if so, I have no hesitation in declaring that, that minute does nothing of the kind. The minute in fact says nothing about the individuals who proposed or adopted it. It in reality, by implication at least, proves the correctness of my statement, as much as it is the minute of a Committee, of which the translators were members and present at the time. The facts connected with the adoption of the spelling in question, in Committee are briefly these. The spelling in the first instance was proposed by one of the translators and objected to by the other. After this the matter was discussed by the translators before the Committee, in a friendly and Christian spirit. The Missionary was convinced, fully acquiesced in the views of his colleague, and recommended the adoption of the new spelling, and not till then, did the Committee come to any resolution on the subject. The Missionary was convinced by the arguments of his colleague, and did not adopt the measure by constraint, as your correspondent insinuates.

3. I am really surprised to see your correspondent trying to make out a case against me, by placing my assertion in a false position. My words are these,—"In regard however to the Urdu version which has given rise to this controversy," &c. the dispute is not now between the Committee and translator, but between the Committee and translators on the one hand, and some of the readers and distributors of the Bible on the other. Now, Sir, is it fair, is it becoming in one who hesitates not to accuse me of misrepresentation, to take my words out of their proper connection and to apply them to a subject to which I never applied them. I never intended nor did I apply the terms translators, distributors, &c. to any other than the version in question, and therefore in its proper connection my assertion is literally and strictly correct. Whose is the mistake now, I will not call it, as my accuser does, misstatement of facts?*

It is a strange fact, and shows how little dependence is to be placed in the cautiousness (not to use a harsher phrase) of your correspondent. that the very paragraph to which he objects, as a misstatement of the views of one of the translators, and the part he took in this business, was suggested to me originally by that translator himself. Let the Mofussil Missionary reflect on this, it may furnish him with a wholesome lesson in future.

4. I know not whether your correspondent charges me with any other misstatement, if he does, let him be explicit, I shall honestly meet his charges, and if in error in the least, I shall cheerfully confess it,—I hate all quibbling. Perhaps he means to call in question the correctness of my views when I said that the question was a matter of principle on the one side and of expediency on the other. If so, I may state in reply; 1. That this is my opinion founded on the documents published, and even if I were mistaken in judgment it is not a misstatement of facts. 2. The very same view is taken of it by the Committee of the Bible Society, (see their minutes in the Calcutta Christian Observer,) for whom your correspondent professes to have so high a respect.

* How far the resolution of the Society may or is intended to affect future versions, is a matter of opinion, regarding which your correspondent and I may differ without either being guilty of a misstatement of facts.

I am afraid of occupying more of your space, otherwise I might expose some of the errors into which your correspondent has fallen regarding the intentions and doings of the Auxiliary Bible Society, I may merely state that I do not agree with the statement made by him, and that I know that a very different version of the matter could be given by a writer on the other side. I now leave it to your correspondent to determine what is becoming on his part, and promising not to trouble you any more on this subject, unless I am compelled to do so in vindication of my statements of facts.

I am, yours truly,

A MEMBER OF THE CALCUTTA BIBLE SOCIETY.

Calcutta, 3d July, 1843.

We have reluctantly admitted this letter on the controversy, because the writer defends himself from a charge of misstatement. We have other letters which would occupy, twelve closely printed columns. We are obliged to close the controversy, as far as we are concerned.—Ed.

REPORT OF THE MEETING OF THE CONGREGATIONAL UNION OF SCOTLAND, AT ABERDEEN—PATRIOT.—At the meeting in George-street Chapel, Mr. Leslie introduced the business of the evening by tracing the rise, progress, and the present state of Independency in Aberdeen. He stated that they were then met in the first Congregational church which had been formed in this city, and remarked upon the singular circumstance that the Rev. gentleman by whom the church—consisting of eleven members—was formed, and the chapel opened for public worship, nearly forty years ago, was then present—he meant the Rev. Dr. Bennett of London. It was Dr. Bennett who first proclaimed the Gospel within these walls; and it could not but be gratifying to his heart to find, that not only had the principles of civil and religious liberty, which he then enunciated, taken root in the public mind, but had spread to every part of Scotland. Independency, which was then in its infancy, was now rising into the vigour of its strength, there being no fewer than a hundred and twenty churches in the connexion, not bound together by a rope of sand—as some of their politico-ecclesiastical friends had said—but united in the fervent bonds of Christian affection, and rejoicing in the liberty with which Christ makes his people free. Mr. Leslie then made some very suitable observations on the character and influence of the Congregational Union, and expressed his high satisfaction at finding that the first meeting of the body in Aberdeen had done more than realised all the expectations that had been formed regarding it. In conclusion, he called upon the members and friends of the Union, to renew their exertions on behalf of the principle on which it was based, and to take encouragement to persevere, from the fact, that a large and influential body of Christians, who at one time were amongst the most formidable opponents which the Voluntary principle had to contend with, were now about to throw off the trammels of State connexion, and become auxiliaries in the glorious cause of religious freedom. The union of evangelical Christians was never more needed than at the present moment, when a dominant priesthood, through the highest authority in the land, were exerting their influence to train the youth after their own models, and thus seek to bind the children in the chains of ecclesiastical bondage, though the parents might go free.—The report of the Committee was then read by the Secretary, the Rev. Mr. Watson, of Musselburgh, which gave a very encouraging account of the condition and prospects of the Union, the most striking point of detail being an increase in the total amount of funds collected, notwithstanding the great depression which has prevailed during the year among all classes of society.

PUSEYITE MODESTY.—We are frequently compelled to wish that some means existed, by which the teachers and expounders of the new Oxford system could be made to place that system fairly before the world. At present, using to the fullest extent the advantages they possess, of non-accountability, they are continually putting forth the most inconsistent and contradictory views, and no one is able to force them to say how it is that black is black at one moment, and white the next.

For instance, what can be more constantly obtruded upon the view than exaggerated ideas as to the sanctity and power of the Episcopate? And yet, where have we ever seen, in modern times, more contumacious and rebellious assaults upon the general authority and specific acts of our Bishops, than we find in the pages of these same writers?

The latest instance of this, is now before us in a tract recently issued from Parker's and Rivingtons'; which common report assigns to, and which internal evidence affiliates upon, Mr. Palmer, of Magdalen College. The subject is the recent institution of the Jerusalem bishopric.

Mr. Palmer, who is one of those ultra-Episcopalians described in the preface to Froud's Remains, as considering fellowship with Christ, out of an Episcopal communion, a mere "impossibility;"—Mr. Palmer thus deals with the present Primate of the English Church, and with the Bishop of London:—

"It seems that the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London have ruled in the name of our Church,

"I. That people calling themselves Protestants or Reformed, (especially foreigners,) may be admitted to our communion as members of sister Churches, though they neither bring canonical letters from any bishop, nor acknowledge any bishop from whom they might bring them if required, nor any from whose unjust sentence of excommunication they appeal: which position is contrary to the fundamental discipline of the Universal Church, and of our own; and subjects the bishop who acts upon it to deposition by the canons.

"II. They have ruled, that laymen who have never been confirmed by a bishop, either by imposition of his hands or by chrism of his consecration, may be admitted to communion, and even ordained, although they are not 'ready' or 'desirous' to be confirmed at all: which is to dispense with what St. Paul (even by Calvin's own confession) makes a fundamental 'element' of Christianity, and is directly contrary to the law of our own, and of the whole Church.

"III. They have ruled, that clergy ordained by our bishops may and ought not only to communicate with communities which recognise no bishop, as with true Churches, and with clergy of no orders, ordained originally by mere priests or laymen, as with true clergy, but also themselves to seek and exercise the so-called 'pastoral office' in such communities conjointly with the sacerdotal office in our own Church: which is contrary to the canons of the whole Church, and to the rubrics and laws of our own.

"IV. They have ruled, that it is a matter of choice and discretion for Christian laity, clergy, and congregations, to accept or not to accept the pastoral care of the bishop: whereas even to maintain the position that any persons or congregations not submitting to the bishops are true Churches, subjects the offender to excommunication by the canons of the whole Church, and of our own.

"V. They have dispensed with oaths (both for themselves and for bishops and clergy whom they may ordain) and with canons and rubrics, which by the same oaths they were bound to follow and to enforce; and have even pledged themselves and others to act in direct opposition to them.

"These things having been done by them, in the name of the Church, and with a high hand, the question for us to consider is, first, whether their acts have legally and formally, and of their own inherent force, bound the Church? secondly, in what case may they virtually bind here? thirdly, what is their bearing upon ourselves?

"The first question is easily answered. It is evident that the act and treaty of the two prelates in question cannot proprio vigore bind the Church; because they are of themselves illegal and uncanonical, and subject their authors to deprivation, and even to excommunication: for the bishop, and still more the archbishop, is set to keep and enforce the laws of the Church, and not to break them or authorize others to break them: and if any law be changeable in itself, still it is not actually changed till it has been repealed or altered by an authority equal or superior to that which enacted it."

But, again, considering the question of implied consent, he argues:—

"We conclude, therefore, that those acts of the Archbishop and the Bishop of London, into the character of which we have been examining, though they would have been in themselves simply illegal and uncanonical enormities, if they had been done with an arrogant or wicked mind,—having been done from an opinion of duty, and on the assumption of the concurrence of the other bishops, and of the whole body both of clergy and laity, will actually involve the Church, if they are deliberately and permanently accepted, or acquiesced in by her members."

Such is the style in which this deacon of the Church—for Mr. Palmer, we believe, is no more—deals with its highest prelate. His whole hypothesis is false, being merely this: that all non-Episcopalians (such as the Prussian Churches), are without the pale of Christianity. But, charitably to increase his horror, we must place before him one other fact, which, though of ordinary occurrence, is utterly irreconcileable with this his theory.

On Tuesday last, the 25th of this present April, a Meeting was held of the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council. The business was connected with the Church, and accordingly, the Archbishop of Canterbury was present, not accidentally, but ex officio, as the chief adviser as to what should be done.

And at that Meeting of the Privy Council, the following order was agreed upon, not in spite of, but with the entire concurrence of, the Primate of the Anglican Church.

"It is this day ordered by their Lordships, that every minister and preacher, as well of the Established Church in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, as those of the Episcopal communion, protected and allowed by an Act passed in the 10th year of her Majesty Queen Anne, do, at some time, during the exercise of Divine service in their respective churches, congregations, and assemblies, put up their prayers and thanksgivings to Almighty God for Her Majesty's safe delivery of a Princess."

The like kind of order, and exactly so worded, has, we apprehend, been agreed to by every Archbishop of Canterbury for the last century at the least. We leave Mr. Palmer to reconcile it with his system in the best manner that he may.—Record.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND SOCIETY.—On Thursday a very numerous and respectable Meeting of this Society, which has for one of its objects the promotion of Christian education in Syria, took place at the Hanover-square Rooms. The Hon. Captain Maude, R. N., took the chair, and announced that an orthodox Christian, Assad Y. Kayat, a native of Syria, would address the Meeting. Assad, he said, besides many recommendations of his ability, integrity, and Christian zeal, had testimonials from Mr. Farrar, so many years British Consul at Damascus, and from Lady F. Egerton whom, as well as her Lord, he accompanied in their late journey to the Holy Land. Assad then addressed the Meeting for about two hours in very intelligible English, to show that the actual generation of Christian Syrians were direct descendants from the first converts to the true faith by our Saviour and his apostles. The means of proof he used were interesting, and his manner of using them learned and ingenious. He stated that the manners, habits, and customs of the Syrian Christians remained unchanged, either by Roman or Mahometan conquests, by Arianism, or by the subtle efforts at proselytism by Jesuit missionaries sent by the Bishops of Rome. Nothing could ever make one of those orthodox believers doubt for a moment the divinity of Christ. The scriptural names of towns, rivers, and mountains, still remained the same in the language of the Christian Syrians, although the names given to them in profane history were forgotten or unknown. Every Christian Syrian, no matter how ignorant otherwise he might be, knew of Damascus, Bethlehem, Jordan, Lebanon, &c., and could describe their precise locality, whilst he knew nothing of the sites of the magnificent heathen cities. Teaching by parables was still common in Syria, and many of the figurative illustrations so frequent in the Scriptures, and not easily understood by western nations, were palpably intelligible to the Syrians, for they were drawn from customs or objects still existing as they did in the days of the apostles. The Syrian Christians were opposed to the errors of Rome, and acknowledged only four hierarchs, viz., the Patriarchs, or Bishops of Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople. The Syrian clergy married, and whilst they remained single they were not permitted to live in towns, and this Church was directly opposed to monkish celibacy, as being contrary to Divine ordination. The speaker concluded by saying that the Christian Syrians needed only education, in which England could assist them to render them extremely useful, in disseminating Evangelic truth among the people of the East. The above is but a very faint sketch of Assad's discourse. That it afforded general satisfaction was proved by the collection made as the Meeting were separating, after having voted thanks to the gallant Chairman, and to the erudite and zealous Syrian.—Ibid.

THE PROPAGATION SOCIETY.—We intimated in our last the resignation of Mr. Campbell as Secretary of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Obviously it is a matter of vast importance upon whom the choice of the Society, as his successor, shall rest, both as proving what is the present prevailing influence in the Society, and showing forth what will be its probable future course in relation to the Tractarian heresy.

Every one knows that the Under-Secretary of the Society, the Rev. Mr. Hawkins, is very high indeed in Church views in comparison of Mr. Campbell; that, in short, he is a reputed Tractarian. And we have reason to believe, that among the chief difficulties which Mr. Campbell experienced in following a simple and straight course in the discharge of his duties, was the strong leanings of Mr. Hawkins to measures fitted to strengthen the Tractarian influence in the Society in all respects.

We beg our readers carefully to inquire into this matter, and to be very careful that they are not misled. We think they will find that what we now say is correct. And, accordingly, they must strongly feel that, if instead of a new Secretary being nominated to the vacant situation, Mr. Hawkins be advanced to the office of chief Secretary, with a junior placed under him, the position of the Society with reference to Tractarian influence and appointments (bad as it has recently been), will be wofully deteriorated. We solicit their immediate and close attention to this very important point.—Record.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN FRANCE.—The Constitutionnel, in reference to some hindrance given at Mantes and Versailles, to the celebration of Protestant worship, and to the question now before the Court of Cassation, whether the law regulating public Meetings can be deemed applicable to Meetings held for the celebration of religious rites, contains the following observations:—

"The Court of Cassation will in a few days have to give a decision on one of those questions which interest freedom of conscience; viz., to know whether the law against Associations can be applied to meetings for the celebration of any kind of worship recognised by the State. The strict execution of the Charter, which promised to all forms of worship equal protection and liberty, has been regarded in another sense by the Ministry. In the commune of Senneville a certain number of Protestants wished to have a place of worship and a pastor. The civil tribunals caused the doors to be closed, and prosecuted the pastor and his followers on the plea of holding illegal Meetings. Two judgments have been given by the tribunals of Mantes and Versailles, condemning the Protestant minister to a fine, and ordering the closing of the chapel. It is on the merit of these decisions that the Court of Cassation will have to decide. The independence of the Supreme Court, the wisdom which presides over its decisions, give us the firmest hopes that the judgment submitted to it will be set aside, and that it will, by its sentence, check the inferior tribunals in their progress of religious intolerance into which the Ministry wish to lead them. The Chambers have also taken up the complaints of the persecuted Protestants, and there is no doubt but that it will demand proper explanations from the Ministry on the subject. The complaints of the followers of the reformed worship increase every day, and the irritation which the partiality of the Ministry has caused has reached its utmost point of endurance; we repeat, therefore, that we anxiously look for the decision of the Supreme Court, whose deliberative judgment will shortly be directed to this important subject."—Ibid.

INCREASING INTOLERANCE OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.—From time out of mind it has been the custom in Strasburg for the one church to serve Catholics and Protestants at different hours, one end of the church being devoted to one worship, another to the other. The present Minister of Public Worship, as great a bigot as ever disgraced the days of Charles X., has put an end to this harmony which Charles X. and his clergy respected. M. Martin, of Nord, has issued a decree brutally turning the Protestants out of these mixed churches.—Pat.

EXTRACT FROM THE APPEAL OF THE PARIS MISSIONARY SOCIETY ON THE SUBJECT OF THE FRENCH AGGRESSIONS IN THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.—French Protestant Christians! the facts to which we invite your most serious attention are grave, and may have a sad and fatal influence on the future. The faith which you profess is followed, persecuted, destroyed, to the ends of the earth, in the persons and labours of these English and American brethren, whom we love, because they believe the same Gospel as ourselves; for the truth is neither English, nor American, nor French; it is emphatically Christian wherever it exhibits itself in life and power. We ought to rejoice in its victories, be afflicted at its trials, sympathise with its contests, give a helping hand in its struggles, and when it is threatened, bestir ourselves with earnestness. Then you have seen that the Romish Church wishing to overturn it, and probably not deeming itself strong enough, single handed, leans for support upon an arm of flesh, invokes the aid of the civil power, and makes alliance with brute force. These are the vessels of the State which transport its missionaries to the isles of the great ocean; these are our officers of marine, and our admirals who instal them in their posts. The cannons of our frigates, and the bayonets of our marines, are there, not only to protect, but to impose them. A propaganda army was organised in the name of France.* Placed thus between the most cruel of alternatives,—desirous, on the one hand, to rejoice on every occasion of national prosperity, and to associate ourselves with all the glory of our country; and, on the other hand, not being able to subscribe to injustice, oppression, and violence; compelled even by our patriotism as Frenchmen, our consciences as men, and our faith as Christians, to protest against such deplorable abuses of national power—what can we hope for, what have we not to fear? For if, when the Society Islands were independent, Catholicism, feeling itself supported by our squadrons, is become so formidable to a mission whose ruin appears to have been determined on, what may not be effected for its destruction, now that France decides, as it is declared, to make them pay for its protection at the price of their repose, their prosperity, and their safety?

The people of the Pacific desire to live sober, and they are to be compelled to be intemperate; they make laws against the production and introduction of inebriating liquors into their country, and they are to be forced to buy and to consume the ruinous fruits of our distilleries; they repel Catholicism, and they are to be obliged to receive it permanently; they only ask to rest in peace, and with the priests of Rome their country is to be fired with the torch of discord. "No, certainly," observed on a recent occasion the Minister for Foreign Affairs, at the tribunal of the Chamber of Peers, "the King's Government, wherever it may penetrate, will never occasion a retrograde movement to the cause of Christianity and civilization." These are imposing words. How is it that we are bound to declare that they are already contradicted by facts?

It is only within these few years that French influence has been felt in the Pacific; and now, where ten years ago not a single case of drunkenness could be found, intoxicated people are often to be met with in the streets; where they followed in peace the precepts of the Word of God, without seeking for anything in the Gospel but edification, one is now compelled to engage in harsh and incessant controversy; where the natives submitted without reluctance to the laws of a paternal government, men led away by party spirit foment discontent and revolt—where concord prevailed there is now division.

"The moral aspect of these isles," lately wrote the Missionary Bishop, "is covered with clouds—our assemblies are diminished, Christian charity has waxed cold—and, with the introduction of intoxicating drinks the other vices of Paganism have appeared to spring up anew." The prospects of the mission, then, are compromised, and the labour of forty years is theatened with impending ruin. Is it thus that the French Government intends to propagate religion and civilization?"—Pat.

FRENCH PROPAGANDISM IN POLYNESIA.—"The effect produced in England by the occupation of Tahiti," remarks the Sémeur of last week, "has been precisely what we foresaw. The indifference of political men has been as complete, as the astonishment of religious men has been painful and profound." The declarations of Lord Aberdeen and Sir Robert Peel are understood as indicating, that there is no political difficulty on the subject between the two Governments. "We have even some ground for thinking," it is added, "that communications had been exchanged between them a year ago, before the French Admiral received orders to act as he has done. There is no longer, then, any possibility of rivalry on this point between France and England; national self-love is not involved in the question; and we have already shown that the national interests is not concerned either. The political question being thus set aside, there remains absolutely only the religious question; and in this point of view, the intention of the French Government to sustain the Catholic Propaganda in Oceanea cannot be doubted."

Our readers may recollect, that Capt. Laplace, whose doings, as commander of the Artémise frigate, at Tahiti and the Sandwich Islands, met with the warm approval of the French Government, and whose special commission seems to have been, to track the English, and prepare the elements of all possible mischief to British commerce and British influence,—met at Teneriffe the Papal Vicar Apostolic of Polynesia, upon whom he has pronounced a fervid eulogy, predicting that he would soon bring under civilization the barbarous tribes over whom the English Missionaries not been able to obtain any influence! (Patriot, Jan. 6, 1842) The Sémeur remarks, that it would be unjust to throw the whole responsibility on Admiral Dupetit Thouars, as if he had acted of his own accord. He has been governed by instructions from home! There can be no doubt that the plan has been long laid, and that the Protestant M. Guizot, the Minister of Peace, the friend of civilization, has acted in this affair towards our Missions, just as he has acted in the question of slavery, deceiving those who trusted to his smooth professions, and betraying the cause he affected to patronise. The statement that our own Government has been a consenting party to the project of establishing, by force of arms, French Propagandists throughout Polynesia, demands, however, to be inquired into. Have we no one in the House of Commons sufficiently alive to the interests of our Protestant Missions, to take up this subject with a view to elicit the requisite explanations? If the allegation is unfounded, it ought to be at once contradicted. We see that at the meeting of Wednesday next, the Earl of Roden has consented to preside, which we hail as an assurance that the cause is felt to be not that of any party or sect, much less is it a political question, being an affair of the deepest concern to all true Protestants of every communion, whether at home or abroad. The lively interest taken in the subject by our brethren in Paris does honour to their principles. We could wish to see the demonstration responded to with equal earnestness in the United States; but we have reason to fear that we can rely upon the political men of America as little as upon our own.—Pat.

FRENCH PROPAGANDISM IN THE SOUTH SEAS.—We have deemed it advisable to avoid mixing up commercial considerations with the religious question involved in the occupation of Polynesia by the French. It is certainly of some importance, not to Great Britain only and to her Australasian Colonies, but to America also, that the independence of these Islands should be guaranteed, and the maritime stations they afford, be accessible, as now, to merchantmen of all nations. It reflects no credit upon the sagacity of our Government, that they should have allowed the independence of Tahiti to be placed in jeopardy after our protection had been repeatedly and earnestly invoked. Still, it is not the unwise neglect of our commercial interests that we feel disposed to complain of, so much as the culpable disregard of the higher interests intrusted to us, which has been exhibited in this perfidious abandonment of the field of Protestant Missionary labour to the armed Apostles of a licentious Jesuitism. That there are persons in this country, calling themselves Christians, who would prefer to see Popish Missions, even in connexion with a foreign power, established on the ruins of the flourishing churches planted by Protestant Missionaries of the Dissenting communions, is, unhappily, but too certain. The Times, in an Article worthy of M. Guizot himself, contrasts the Protestant and the Romish Missions in the following significant terms:—"Until a comparatively recent period, the business of foreign missions in this country has chiefly devolved upon representatives of the Dissenting persuasions which exist in Great Britain; whilst the Roman Catholic Missionary, whether from Paris or from Rome, spoke the language and assumed the authority of a representative of a constituted and universal church." For what purpose is this remark made? To account, apparently, for "the success of the Roman Catholic Missions throughout the Globe for the last 300 years!" We cannot spare time to expose the ignorance or gross unfairness of this statement; but must content ourselves with reminding our readers, that the successes of Protestant Dissenting Missions during the last fifty years, throw into the shade those of the Romish Missionaries during the three preceding centuries. But who does not see that the very circumstance that the British Missionaries assume no such ecclesiastical authority, and are wholly unconnected with any National Establishment or State Church, is that which ought to have disarmed foreign rivalry, and protected them against hostile interference? The Chronicle justly remarks, that if Governments begin to take upon themselves to preach and push a religious propaganda, the consequence would be a revival of the religious wars of other days. "Our great complaint against France," remarks our Contemporary, "and especially against M. Guizot, is, that he has entered upon this bigoted and dangerous policy of religious rivalry. Whilst the Court Camarilla of the Tuileries, and its knot of priests, are anxiously extending Catholicism in America and the Pacific, M. Guizot has raised the same standard in Europe and in Asia. Throughout the Levant and the East, M. Guizot has replaced the tri-coloured flag by the old labarum of CONSTANTINE. Throughout the entire empire of Turkey, M. Guizot has sent agents to represent France as the only pure Christian and Catholic land, the only country through whose aid the Christian of the East could be aided in the work of regeneration. Money has not been spared. It has been showered on the Syrian convents; and that supremacy which French fleets and armies were forbidden to assert, is, by M. Guizot's policy, to be attained by the Cross. In hoc signo vinces, is M. Guizot's circular to his envoys in the Levant. St. Louis, could he have laid aside the courage and activity of the soldier, and remained merely the bigot and the saint, would have adopted no other policy. Were all this the result of religious zeal, the effort would deserve the credit of sincerity; and even those who deprecated the re-introduction of religious propagandism into international polities, might applaud the piety and energy of the act. But this crusade of the nineteenth century has been got up in the name of Catholicism, by a nation which glories in the profession of Infidelity, led by a Minister who prides himself on being a Protestant. Never, certainly, was the prostitution of religion to political ends so scandalous and barefaced."—Ibid.

HALLE.—(From our private Correspondent.)

* It may be seen, from the Journal des Debats of the 27th of March, in what manner Admiral Du Petit Thouars and his crew propose to labour for the amelioration of the manners and for the civilization of the natives of Otaheite. We will not here repeat the details given on this subject, by an eye-witness himself, an actor in the sad scenes which took place on board the admiral's ship, the Reine Blanche, in the month of October last, in Papeeté harbour. The recital would pollute these pages. It will suffice to state that the French seamen appear to have left no means untried to replunge the Tahitian women into the abyss of corruption from which the Gospel had delivered them.—Translation.

—It is understood that the post held by the late Professor Gesenius, is to be filled by Professor Hupfeld, of Marburg, one of his most distinguished pupils. This appointment will be peculiarly gratifying to the friends of evangelical truth, as the views of Hupfeld are very different from those of the late professor of Hebrew. A severe attack on the lungs, which has occasioned some apprehension to his friends, is the only circumstance likely to be any impediment to the conclusion of the intended appointment.—Pat.

EARTHQUAKE IN ANTIGUA AND ST. KITTS.—MORAVIAN MISSION IN THE WEST INDIES.—The Committee have published the following amongst other extracts of letters, received from Antigua and St. Kitts, by the last West Indian mail. They express at the same time their lively gratitude to God, for the protection mercifully vouchsafed to the missionaries and their families, and for the preservation from utter ruin of the ten Settlements, which have been more or less affected by the earthquake.

The islands which have been the scene of this wide-spreading calamity, have, for more than half a century, been among the most important and fruitful fields of missionary labour occupied by the Brethren's Church. At the present time, about 15,500 souls,—no small proportion of the negro and coloured population,—are under the spiritual care of the missionaries; and about 3,000 children are enjoying, through their instrumentality, the blessing of Christian education.—

EXTRACT OF LETTER FROM BR. B. HARVEY.

"St. John's Antigua, Feb. 18, 1843.

"On the 8th of February, at about twenty-three minutes to eleven a. m. this island was awfully convulsed by an earthquake, the most violent that has occurred within the memory of man. Churches, chapels, schools, mills, sugarworks, and other buildings constructed of stone, have, with few exceptions, been thrown down or ruined. Our old wooden church is the only one remaining in town fit for use, and, I need hardly add, is crowded with hearers. Our lives have been mercifully spared. Such a fearful visitation I never expect to experience, till 'The voice of the Lord shall again shake terribly the earth.' Pray for us, that our faith may be sustained, and our strength rendered sufficient for the discharge of the important and harassing duties which devolve upon us. Yesterday, being the day appointed for general humiliation and thanksgiving, we preached six times, in three different places."

FROM BR. W. REICHEL.

"St. John's, Feb. 18th, 1843.

"I was walking in the town, when the earthquake occurred; the first symptom of it which I perceived, was a rattling noise accompanied by a gentle undulatory motion of the earth. This motion became more violent every second, till at length it was scarcely possible to stand upright. Before me was the cathedral, the walls of which I saw fearfully shaken, and at length partially give way, and fall together. On every side, the stone houses were falling, while a thick cloud of dust enveloped the whole town. I suppose this convulsion of nature lasted nearly three minutes. As I looked around me, I saw numbers of people kneeling or lying on the earth, from whose lips, the cry 'Lord, have mercy upon us!' was continually resounding. On my return home, I found all my dear fellow-servants alive and unhurt, and the damage done to our mission-premises, less serious than I had expected. Our old wooden church, and three dwelling houses of the same material, are but little injured; but the stone house, occupied by Br. Harvey, has so many rents in the walls, and is altogether so shaken, that it must be nearly rebuilt. The kitchen and other offices are in ruins."

FROM BR. G. W. WESTERBY.

"Lebanon, Feb. 18th, 1843.

"On the 7th inst., my wife and I paid a visit to Gracehill, and on the morning of the 8th, Br. and Sr. Voss accompanied us to Monk's Hill, on the summit of which a fort is built, whence there is a beautiful view of the whole of Antigua, and the island of Montserrat, about thirty miles distant. It was a lovely morning, and the prospect around was most delightful. We were all upon the ramparts watching the approach of the steamer from England, and I was in the act of steadying a telescope on one of the great guns, when I felt it begin to vibrate; I knew at once what was coming, and seizing my wife by the hand, and calling to the others, I immediately rushed from the ramparts. We had not gone far, before the motion of the earth became so violent, that we were no longer able to walk, and were obliged to take hold of each other to keep on our feet. It was a most awful moment, and our lives were in great peril. A little from us the houses were falling; just above us, on a rising ground, a heap of canon balls were heaving and rattling in the most fearful manner, and on our right, the long signal-staff was bending from side to side, and threatening every moment to fall upon us. I believe the shock lasted about three minutes. When it subsided, we looked over the island, and towards Montserrat, and in every direction we saw clouds of dust ascending, a sign of the widely-spread ruin.

"We had not long retired to rest, when we felt another smart concussion, and immediately rushed out of doors. This shock brought down more of our church. We have since had many slight ones. On the 9th, I buried the three children, killed by the falling of a church, side by side. Another has since died of the injuries received.

"The island is in ruins; how the fine crop of sugar will be taken off, no one can tell! May the Lord make 'all things work together for good!' During the earthquake, the bells at Gracehill and Lebanon rang as if for Divine service. Below Gracehill the earth opened and threw out water. The barometer was higher than it had been for some time before.

"We now have our public services out of doors. These were attended, last Sunday morning, by more than a thousand persons. May the Lord bless the preaching of his word to many souls!

"The church is to be rebuilt of wood. We must commence the work in faith. Whence the money is to come, the Lord alone knows."

FROM BR. P. RICKSECKER.

"Basseterre, St. Kitts, Feb. 20th, 1843.

"With a thankful heart I hasten to inform you, that we have all been preserved from bodily harm during the late awful earthquake, and that our mission-premises at this place have sustained less injury than might have been anticipated. Our new church and school-house have got several rents in the walls, which, however, can be easily made good. At Bethesda the damage done is more considerable. Both the church and the school-house have been severely shaken, but the walls, though cracked in many places, we hope are capable of repair. The guest-house is quite ruined. Bethel has nearly escaped.

"Ever since this severe visitation, our evening services have been attended by many, whom we had never seen in our chapel before. On the 15th, the day appointed by the Governor as a fast and thanksgiving day, an immense crowd filled every part of the building, and even flowed over into the school-house. The service was marked by deep solemnity; and we trust an abiding impression has been made on the minds of those who attended it, and who were affectionately reminded of what they owed to him, who is the God of salvation, and to whom belong the issues of death. (Psalm lxviii. 20.)"—Record.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LONDON SOCIETY FOR TEACHING THE BLIND TO READ.—The Sixth Annual Meeting of this charitable and most interesting Institution was held on Thursday at the Hanover-square Rooms. The most Noble the Marquis of Cholmondeley in the chair. The proceedings opened with prayer, and the singing of a hymn by a number of the pupils of the Blind School, who were ranged upon the platform. The Chairman then briefly addressed the Meeting, regretting the inability to preside of one of the Right Reverend Prelates, who had been accustomed to take the chair at the Meetings of the Society. The Rev. Septimus Ramsay read the Report, which spoke in grateful terms of the success which had attended the efforts of the Society, and of the facility with which the blind acquired the art of reading by the aid of Mr. Lucas's stenographic characters, which were stated to be far superior to those of Mr. Frere. The school in London contained thirty pupils and twenty day boarders. The receipts during the past year, ending December 31, 1842, amounted to 1,163*l.* 18s. 9d., and the expenditure during the same period to 1,102*l.* 4s, leaving a balance of 61*l.* 14s. 9d. in the hands of the Treasurer. The subscriptions during the year amounted to 271*l.* 16s. 3d., and the donations to 306*l.* 14s. The children then read several passages from the Scriptures with a facility and an emphasis which excited at once the astonishment and admiration of the very large assemblage of auditors. Two little girls also, natives of China, read a part of the Epistle to the Romans with a great deal of fluency and a very pleasing intonation of voice. Upon the Motion of Dr. Hugh Pearson, the dean of Salisbury, seconded by the Rev. J. Gouring, the Report was accepted. On the Motion of Sir Charles Clarke, a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman; and another hymn, sung by the children, concluded the business of the Meeting.—Record.

LEGALITY OF ART UNIONS.—A short time ago, Sir Edward Sugden, the present High Chancellor of Ireland, was at the Royal Irish Institution, examining some pictures about to be sold by auction. Mr. Stewart Blacker, the Honorary Secretary to the Irish Art Union, being in the rooms at the same time, spoke to him relative to the assumed illegality of the Art Unions, when Sir Edward stated his opinion that the laws which have been referred to did not in any way apply to such Societies. Mr. Blacker having expressed his gratification at hearing this, Sir Edward said, "If you like I will give you my opinion in writing," and taking a pen, wrote an order to the Royal Bank to pay the Art Union three guineas annually until further notice.—Irish paper.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION.—At a Meeting of the local council held last week at Cork, it was resolved that this learned body should commence its next session in this city on Thursday, the 17th of August. The attendance is likely to be very large, as the Meeting commences not only just at the termination of the assizes, but just previous to Her Majesty's contemplated visit to Ireland. The local subscriptions are going on well, at the head of which stands the name of the Earl of Rosse, the President. The Noble President has announced that his gigantic reflecting telescope will be completed, and thrown open for the inspection of members.—Record.

QUARANTINE.—It is with no small degree of satisfaction that we announce to our readers, more particularly those interested in commerce, an important reduction in the quarantine. The quarantine from the Ionian Islands has been abolished in toto, although arrivals from Athens or Syria are not included in the exemption. As regards arrivals from Egypt, the quarantine imports on vessels and cargoes has not been reduced, but that inflicted on passengers has been reduced from twenty to sixteen days. No reduction has been made as regards Turkey, either in passengers, vessels, or goods, but we have little doubt she will be shortly included in the list of exempted places. From Greece, some indulgence is granted to merchant vessels, for on their arrival at Malta, provided they are furnished with a certificate from Her British Majesty's Consul to the effect that no disease reigns in the country, their quarantine is reduced to seven days, nor are they under the necessity of discharging cargoes.—Ibid.

PROBABLE REPRISALS AT TAHITI.—The Vindictive, 50, Captain Toup Nicolas, arrived at Hobart Town, from China, in sixty-four days, on the 20th November. It was said, but we can hardly credit it, that Captain Nicolas intends calling at Otaheite, before proceeding to Valparaiso, to avenge the outrage some time ago perpetrated on Queen Pomare and her subjects by the captain of a French frigate, by placing the British standard on that island, thus placing the good Queen and our ally under British protection.—Hampshire Telegraph.

FRANCE.—The Moniteur publishes the proceeds of the revenue during the first quarter of 1843 which show that they amounted to 183,190,000f. being an increase of 19,728,000f., as compared with those of 1841; and of 6,640,000f. over 1842.

The liberal Courrier Francais chuckles on the idea that the report of the Duc de Broglie on the best mode of obtaining the emancipation of the French negro slaves, though but in ten years' time, will be allowed to lie dormant in the archives of the Chamber.

La Presse mentions the death of M. Maguin, the parish priest of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, in his 84th year. "It was this clergyman," says La Presse, "who found means, in 1793, to penetrate into the dungeon occupied by Marie Antoinette in the Conciergerie, and to administer to the illustrious prisoner the consolations of religion."

Rear-Admiral Dupetit Thouars has been raised by a Royal Ordinance, on the 13th inst., to the dignity of Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour.—Pat.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.—Advices from Posen of the 1st inst. state, that the Provincial Diet had commenced the discussion of the Penal Code Amendment Bill, and pronounced by a majority of 25 to 22 the abolition of capital punishment.—Ibid.

THE COMET.—M. Arago made another communication respecting the comet, to the Academy of Sciences, in the sitting of Monday last. He stated that the nucleus had been twice seen from Paris, but that a third observation was necessary, in order to determine the orbit. In this state of things the two observations of Paris were combined with that of Geneva, and it was found that the perihelic distance from the comet to the sun had been under-rated by the observer at Geneva. The comet passed on the 27th of February last at its nearest point to the sun; its rate of travelling was 104 leagues per second.—Record.

It appears, from the calculations made at Paris, that when the railroad from the French capital to Calais, and from Dover to London, is completed, the whole passage from Paris to London can be made in sixteen hours.—Ibid.

A letter from St. Petersburgh states, that M. Allier, Professor of the University of that city, has just discovered in the Imperial Library, 3.1 autograph letters of Henry IV. of France, hitherto unknown. He immediately imparted his discovery to a commission at Paris, especially occupied in collecting the letters of that sovereign.—Ibid.

In the continental territories of the King of the Two Sicilies, there is (says Mr. Macgregor, in his Treaties and Tariffs No. 7) only one teacher to about 1,000 inhabitants, while there is a priest or monk for every 120. In Austria, France, Holland, and Prussia, he adds, the schoolmasters greatly exceed the number of clergymen. The net revenue of the island of Sicily is 1,000,000*l.*; half the amount yearly goes to Naples, never to return. Its population decreased

DESCRIPTION OF JERUSALEM BY SIR DAVID WILKIE, IN A LETTER TO SIR ROBERT PEEL.—"It is a fancy or belief that the art of our time and of our British people may reap some benefit, that has induced me to undertake this journey. It is to see, to inquire, and to judge, not whether I can, but whether those who are younger, or with far higher attainments and powers, may not in future be required, in the advance and spread of our knowledge, to refer at once to the localities of Scripture events, when the great work is to be essayed of representing Scripture history. Great as the assistance, I might say the inspiration, which the art of painting has derived from the illustration of Christianity, and great as the talent and genius have been this high walk of art has called into being, yet it is remarkable that none of the great painters whom the world has hitherto looked for the visible appearance of Scripture scenes and feelings have ever visited the Holy Land.

"What we therefore so much admire in the great masters, must be taken from their own idea, or from secondary information. In this, though Paul Veronese, Titian, Giorgione, and Sebastian del Piombo, all Venetians, have by commerce, and immediate intercourse with the Levant, succeeded in giving in their work a nearer verisimilitude to an eastern people, yet who is there who cannot imagine that such mines as Raphael and Lionardo da Vinci, great as they are, might not have derived a help had they dwelt and studied in the same land which Moses and the prophets, the Evangelists and the Apostles, have so powerfully and graphically described, and which they would have described in vain to the conviction of their readers, but as witnesses and participators in the events which form the subjects of their sacred writings?

"In my journey hither, desirous of taking a review of some of the great works in Germany of Rubens and Rembrandt, I was deeply interested at Munich by the great and meritorious efforts now making by the native painters of that city. These I believe you have seen, and I doubt not with high admiration of the genius of the artists, and munificence of the sovereign who has called them forth. To you, therefore, I speak with deference, and under correction; but as they profess to revive a style of art that has formerly existed, whether Byzantine or early Italian, I have doubts fitted to their purpose, if such a style would either suit the disposition of the English painters, or awaken the attention of the English public, to whom it would be like bringing forward the Talmud and the Fathers of the Church, instead of the Pentateuch and the New Testament.

"The time is now come when our supply in this walk of art must be drawn from the fountain head. The facility of travelling, as well as recent public events, favour our pursuits in this sacred quarter; and I am highly grateful at being permitted to see with my own natural eyes what Jerusalem in our day can still present to us.

"Here, after centuries of ruin and suffering, Jerusalem exists in her greatness. She is elevated on the high table land of Judea, 2,500 feet above the level of the sea. Except the Mount of Olives scarcely any hill near rises above her. Her walls, which encompass her on every side, are higher and more superb than any city walls I have ever seen. The square towers of her gates recal those of Windsor Castle; while their lengthened elevation, with the spires and cupolas they enclose, would have arrested the Poussins and Claudes in preference to all other cities. Her streets, are stone-built, massive, surmounted by arches, through which the solemn vista claims the painter's art, though by that art still unknown and unrepresented; and the people, the Jew, the Arab, and the more humble and destitute, who never change, recal, by their appearance, period of antiquity in everything removed from the present time.

"But besides the habits of man and the stately fashion of his dwelling, which here bear the mark of no modern date, there are other features that carry the impress of sacred history which scarcely any time can change. This I strongly felt a few days ago, when ascending from the vale of Jordan by the way of Jericho. I was particularly struck, as we got near to Jerusalem, with the beautiful aspect of a village that was over against us, like Tivoli or Larici; it was Bethany, the abode of Mary and Martha, and the scene of the raising of their brother Lazarus from the dead. From this the road winds round the Mount of Olives, by a path often frequented by our Saviour, and which opens upon the most beautiful view there is of Jerusalem, where the very point is shown the following verse (St. Luke, ch. xix.) refers to:—

"'And when he was come near he beheld the city, and wept over it saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace; but now they are hid from thine eyes.'

"Changed as this holy city must be since these words were uttered—her sovereignty gone, her people despised, and of her temple not one stone left upon another; yet, shorn of her beams, this sacred place of her grandeur presents one of the most striking spectacles I have ever beheld.

"To the expounder of Scripture, and to the painter of sacred history, this whole territory must supply what can be learnt no where else; and professors of art must make a stir to meet the ideas that travellers can so easily acquire. Indeed, since arriving here, I find a new species of criticism applied to our standard works of art; and my humble pursuits and inquiries appear to introduce somewhat novel subjects of discussion. It has become a question, arising from the present habits of the people here, whether the ancient Jews and apostles lived most like Saracens or Romans; whether they sat on the ground or upon chairs; reposed upon mats or upon bedsteads; and whether the females were then as much secluded from public view as they are now in these countries? I find the learned, both of monks and rabbis, inclined to the former opinion; but as the synagogue upon Mount Zion is filled with seats, like a church, we may hope that the mode of sitting of the apostles at the table of our Lord may not, by any new information, be found to be different from what Lionardo da Vinci has painted it.

"Indeed, nothing here requires any revolution in our opinions of the finest works of art; with all their discrepancies of detail they are yet constantly recalled by what is here before us. The back ground of the Heliodorus of Raphael is a Syrian building; the figures in the Lazarus of Seb. del Piombo are a Syrian people; and the indescribable tone of Rembrandt is brought to mind at every turn, whether in the street, the synagogue, or the holy Sepulchre."—From his Memoirs, just published.—Record.

NEW ZEALAND.—(From the New Zealand Journal.)—The news contained in the file of the Nelson Examiner to the 9th of November, and in the despatches of the New Zealand Company's agents at Wellington and Nelson, is among the most gratifying that we have yet had to announce. It will be perceived that a very amicable understanding existed between the bishop and the agents of the company, and that on the part of the local Government there was exhibited a desire to set at rest those disputed questions which have for some time past arrested the course of New Zealand colonization. Colonel Wakefield, in Company with Mr. Commissioner Spain, had visited Auckland, and the acting Governor had given assurances that he would lend his influence in aiding any arrangement by which the claims of the aborigines for utu, or further compensation, might be immediately met, and that the territory should be then formally proclaimed as Crown domains, and the titles of the company finally confirmed. These arrangements would also be expedited by a personal visit of the acting Governor to the Port Nicholson settlement. In Nelson, the Bishop had shown great zeal and alacrity in the cause of practical education. He had entered into plans for erecting a church, and Church of England cemetery, Sunday and infant-schools, a native hostelry and chapel, an hospital for the reception of sick natives, and a boarding-school for native children; and, in conjunction with the Chief Justice, his co-trustee in the management of the native reserves, was anxious to establish a general system of medical care and industrial education. Extensive importations of cattle had been made by the Eagle from Sydney, the price averaging 10*l.* per head; and 160 sheep imported by the Guide, also from Sydney, had at once realized 25s. a head. Associations had been formed for working the coal-mines in Coal Bay, and four puncheons of the coal had been sent home. The emigrant ships Thomas Harrison, Olympus, and New Zealand, had arrived, and landed the emigrants, with only three deaths. The Chief Justice had held a sort of legal levee in Nelson on the 24th of October, and had made a trip over the Waimea with Colonel Wakefield, and sailed thereafter for New Plymouth, whence he was to make an overland excursion to Auckland in company with the Bishop. A county court was to be held monthly at Nelson, New Zealand. The despatches and news will be read with interest by all the friends of New Zealand. Altogether, what with the appointment of an efficient and zealous Governor, the friendly coalition of the interim Governor, the Bishop, and the agents of the Company, the hearty exertions of the settlers, and the striking tokens of general progress afforded in the letters from private settlers, New Zealand bids fair at this moment to take a new start, and realize all those sanguine hopes which have been temporarily obscured from various causes now almost certain to be removed.—Ibid.

GENERAL ORDERS—QUEEN'S TROOPS.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 13th June, 1843.

No. 36.—1. At a General Court Martial holden at Fort Saint George, on Wednesday, the 17th day of May 1843, Lieutenant Leonard Smith, of Her Majesty's 57th regiment of foot, was arraigned on the following charge:

Charge.—For conduct highly unbecoming the character of an officer, and to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in having at Fort Saint George, Madras, on the 4th of May 1843, been in a state of intoxication, when in attendance at the mess house of Her Majesty's 57th regiment of foot, for the purpose of taking his seat as a member of a Regimental Court Martial, which had been then and there ordered to assemble in regimental orders of the preceding day, and of which, in the same orders, he Lieutenant Smith, had been nominated a member.

The above being in breach of the articles of war.

Finding.—The Court having most maturely weighed and considered the whole of the evidence brought forward in support of the prosecution of the charge, as well as what the prisoner, Lieutenant Leonard Smith, has urged in his defence, is of opinion,

That the prisoner is "guilty" of the charge.

Sentence.—The court having found the prisoner "guilty" as above stated, doth sentence him, the said Lieutenant Leonard Smith, of Her Majesty's 57th regiment of foot, to be cashiered.

Approved and confirmed,
(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General, and
Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

10th June 1843.

His Excellency Lieutenant General the Marquis of Tweeddale, K. T. is requested to report to the Adjutant General and to the Military Secretary, the day on which this sentence may be published at the Head Quarters of Her Majesty's 57th Regiment, and to order that Lieutenant Smith's name may be struck off on that day.

2. Before the same Court Martial assembled on Wednesday, the 17th day of May 1843, Lieutenant Frederick Charles White Fitzpatrick, of Her Majesty's 57th Regiment of Foot, was arraigned on the following charge.

Charge.—For conduct highly unbecoming the character of an officer, and to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, in having at Fort Saint George, Madras, on the 4th of May 1843, been in a state of intoxication, when in attendance at the mess house of Her Majesty's 57th Regiment of Foot, for the purpose of taking his seat as a member of a Regimental Court Martial, which had been then and there ordered to assemble in regimental orders of the preceding day, and of which, in the same orders, he, Lieutenant Fitzpatrick, had been nominated a member.

The above being a breach of the articles of war.

Finding.—The court having most maturely weighed and considered the whole of the evidence brought forward in support of the prosecution on the charge, as well as that the prisoner, Lieutenant Frederick Charles White Fitzpatrick, has urged nothing in his defence, is of opinion.

That the prisoner is "guilty" of the charge.

Sentence.—The court having found the prisoner "guilty" as above stated, doth sentence him, the said Frederick Charles White Fitzpatrick, Lieutenant, of Her Majesty's 57th Regiment of Foot, to be cashiered.

Approved and confirmed,
(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General, and
10th June 1843. Commander-in-Chief, in India.

His Excellency Lieutenant General the Marquis of Tweeddale, K. T., is requested to report to the Adjutant General and to the Military Secretary, the day on which this sentence may be published at the Head Quarters of Her Majesty's 57th Regiment, and to order, that Lieutenant Fitzpatrick's name may be struck off on that day.

3. At a General Court Martial assembled at Dinapore, on Tuesday, the 30th day of May 1843, Private John McKenna, of a detachment of Her Majesty's 50th or Queen's own Regiment of Foot, attached to Her Majesty's 62d Regiment of Foot, was arraigned on the following charge:

Charge.—For highly insubordinate conduct in the following instances:

First Instance.—In having at Dinapore, on or about the 13th day of May 1843, when awarded punishment for misconduct by Lieutenant Frederick T. Lister, of Her Majesty's 50th Regiment of Foot, made use of gross and insubordinate language, in presence of, and towards the said Lieutenant Lister.

Second Instance.—In having at the same time and place, when ordered into confinement by the said Lieutenant Lister for the offence contained in the first instance of the charge, deliberately turned round, and violently struck acting Corporal James Brett, of Her Majesty's 50th Regiment of Foot, his superior officer, then and there in the execution of his duty, and continuing to pursue and strike the said acting Corporal James Brett, in the quarters of the said Lieutenant Lister.

Third Instance.—In having at the same time and place, after quitting the quarters of the said Lieutenant Lister, again violently attacked the said acting Corporal James Brett and knocked him down, at the same time making use of threatening and abusive language towards the said acting Corporal James Brett.

Finding.—The court find the prisoner Private John McKenna, of a detachment of Her Majesty's 50th or Queen's own Regiment of Foot, attached to Her Majesty's 62d Regiment of Foot, guilty of all the three instances of the charge preferred against him.

Sentence.—The court sentence the prisoner, Private John McKenna, of a detachment of Her Majesty's 50th or Queen's own Regiment of Foot, attached to Her Majesty's Regiment of Foot, to suffer a Corporal punishment of two hundred lashes, on his bare back, in the usual manner.

Approved and confirmed.

10th June, 1843. Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

The General Officer commanding the Dinapore division will be pleased to give the necessary orders for the infliction of the punishment awarded.

4. At a General Court Martial assembled at Kurnaul, on the 6th day of June 1843, Lance Corporal George J. Hill, No. 973, Her Majesty's 3d Light Dragoons, was arraigned on the following charges:

Charges.—1st Charge.—For "disgraceful conduct" in having at Kurnaul, on or about the 11th day of March 1843, embezzled, or fraudulently misapplied monies entrusted to his charge by Lieutenant W. E. F. Barnes, Her Majesty's 3d Light Dragoons, belonging to the estate of the late Serjeant John Thomas; also a portion of the balance of pay due to private William Eardley, both of Brevet Major Bond's troop, Her Majesty's 3d Light Dragoons, the whole sum, thus made away with, amounting to one hundred and sixty-nine Rupees, fifteen annas and two pie (169 15 2) or thereabouts.

2d Charge.—For having on or about the same time and place, as above stated, tendered to Lieutenant W. E. F. Barnes, commanding detachment H. M. 3d Light Dragoons, a false receipt for two hundred and six Rupees, fourteen annas, and one pie, (206 14 1) bearing the signature of "Geo. Kauntze," Troop Serjeant Major of Brevet Major Bond's troop, H. M. 3d Light Dragoons, he knowing the same to be a false and forged document—in breach of the articles of war.

Finding.—The court, from the evidence before it, and taking into consideration the prisoner's admission, are of opinion that he is on the 1st charge, guilty; on the 2d charge guilty.

Sentence.—The court having found the prisoner guilty of the charges preferred against him, the same being in breach of the articles of war, do now sentence him, Lance Corporal George J. Hill, No. 973, Her Majesty's 3d Light Dragoons, to suffer imprisonment for twelve (12) lunar months, the second, fifth, and eighth, solitary, in such place as the officer commanding Her Majesty's 3d Light Dragoons, may select; and further, that he be placed under stoppages, not exceeding two-thirds of his pay, till the money deficient, (169 15 1) one hundred and sixty-nine Rupees, fifteen annas, and one pie, be made good.

Charges.—"1st. For having been drunk, when regimental officer of the day, at Cawnpore, on the 3d May 1843.

"2d. For having, on the same day, proceeded in a state of intoxication to the mess house of her Majesty's 9th lancers, at Cawnpore, where he had been invited to dinner, and conducted himself in such a manner at the table as to render it necessary to remove him from the room."

Finding.—"The court are of opinion, that the prisoner Cornet Frederick Brooke Greville, of the 11th regiment light cavalry, is guilty of both the charges preferred against him.

Sentence.—"The court sentence the prisoner Cornet Frederick Brooke Greville, of the 11th regiment light cavalry, to be dismissed from the service of the East India company."

Approved and confirmed.
(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General,
10th June 1843. and Commander-in-Chief in India.

REMARKS BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN INDIA.

If there had been any reasonable ground of hope, that Cornet Greville would have profited by an extension of leniency to him on this occasion, the Commander-in-Chief would have made allowance for that officer's youth, but he must recollect that six months ago some highly reprehensible conduct on his part was overlooked, in the earnest desire that repentance and amendment would have followed. His Excellency's wishes have been disappointed, and he confirms the sentence, in order to prevent the army from being disgraced a third time by Mr. Greville.

The officer commanding the 11th regiment of light cavalry will be pleased to strike that officer's name off the rolls, on the day of this order may be published at Cawnpore, and to report the same to the Adjutant General.

A VERY BEAUTIFUL

ASTRONOMICAL TIME PIECE,

BY SHEARER, OF LONDON.

Who made the first of the kind for H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex.

THE above TIME PIECE is of the most elegant construction, and is so fitted with a glass case to a handsome stand, that every part of the mechanism is distinctly seen. There are two sets of dials, the one shewing mean solar time, and the other sidereal time. Connected with the Clock work are two Globes of six inches diameter; of which the Terrestrial performs a revolution in a mean solar day, so as to exhibit the various places on the Earth's surface, as they are presented to the Sun, the position of which is represented by the meridian circle: whilst the Celestial performs a revolution in a sidereal day, so as to exhibit the stars in the position in which they are in the heavens, at any hour of the day or night. There is lastly a circle placed horizontally, which revolves once a year, so as to shew the day of the month correctly.

The mechanism of the Time Piece, both in design and execution, is of the first order: and to prevent its being injured by the removal of the glass shade, there is an apparatus for winding up the works from the outside, which is entirely detached from the movement except when in the act of winding.

The Time Piece may be seen at Mr. E. Gray's, Hare Street, Calcutta.

THE PAY OF DAROGAS.—We have extracted from the Bengalee Government Gazette, the official communications relative to the increase of the pay of Darogas, to which we alluded some time ago. It will be seen that the pay of twenty-five Darogas is to be raised to 100 Rs. a month; of fifty to 75 Rs. and of a hundred to 50 Rs. monthly. For this improvement of the system, the country is indebted, we believe, to the exertions of Mr. Bird. If his brief tenure of office, scarcely extending over fifteen months, which will shortly cease, had been distinguished by no other beneficial measure, this first practical attempt to remedy the defects of our Police system would be sufficient to render it memorable.

It is impossible however to peruse Mr. Halliday's letter without a painful feeling of humiliation. It is humiliating to find that the Deputy Governor, in pleading for this partial reform with the Supreme Government, is constrained to disarm opposition, by such repeated assurances that it will cost but little. The entire charge incurred by this effort to give the blessings of an improved Police to forty millions of people, is but 75,000 Rupees a year. Yet to secure the assent of Government to this small expenditure, he feels constrained to gild the pill by the assurance that there would be no necessity or indeed likelihood that the full proportion allowed, should receive the higher allowances. As though the chief consideration upon which the concurrence of the Council was likely to turn, was the smallness of the expense rather than the greatness of the benefit, this parsimonious idea is repeated; and it is added "the increase would not actually, or at least not for a long time, come up to that maximum, that is to say, to 75,000 Rupees a year—one-half per cent. of the profits of the Opium monopoly! There can be no doubt that Mr. Bird has acted wisely in employing the strongest argument which could be devised to ensure success; but is there not something radically unsound in the principles of a Government, which requires to be conciliated by such an argument, when the question at stake involves the peace and comfort of so large a community? The Supreme Council appears to have been sensible of the invidious position in which it would be placed in the eyes of the country, by this repeated reference to the smallness of the proposed expenditure, compared as it would be with the magnitude of the public revenues, and the necessity of the reform. In its reply, therefore, we have the grateful assurance that the measure will be hereafter extended, if the present experiment should prove successful. We hope the Court of Directors will not only give the measure the sanction of their approbation, but administer a gentle rebuke to the local Government for its timidity in a matter of such vital importance, and explain that this extreme caution on a question of expenditure, so imperatively required for the benefit of the country, is calculated to produce an unjust and injurious impression on the public mind of the views of the ruling Authorities at home; that they are ashamed to make public the correspondence between the Supreme and subordinate Government, lest it should be remarked that while the Indian administration felt no hesitation at expending seven or eight Millions in a war beyond the Indus, the appropriation of the thousandth part of such a sum to the improvement of the Police, was made with much difficulty. We trust the Court will once for all assure the Council that in every thing which can conduce to the welfare of the people, they are not only authorized but enjoined to display a noble spirit of generosity, and that the smiles of the Court will be proportioned, not to their niggardliness, but to their liberality.

The sanction of the Court of Directors to a more enlarged expenditure of the public funds for the improvement of the local administration, cannot indeed longer be withheld. Mr. Bird has the merit not only of having taken the initiative in this matter of police reform, but the still greater merit of having rendered it impossible for Government to stop at the limit which bounded his exertions. He has placed it on record that the Darogahs are universally corrupt, that their European officers regard them universally with mistrust, and that the people they are appointed to protect, instead of feeling any sense of security from their presence have a new object of apprehension before them. He has traced these defects in our police, by which its object is almost entirely defeated, in a great measure to the inadequacy of their allowances. He designates the present system as impolitic and demoralizing, and affirms that it is vain to expect any improvement while it lasts. He has thus in a measure constrained his successors to continue the good work which he has commenced; for the point of reform at which he has been reluctantly obliged to pause, still leaves two-thirds of the Darogahs under the influence of this demoralizing system, to prey upon the vitals of the country, and carry dismay among those whom they are appointed to defend. It is impossible that the system thus laid bare and denounced by the highest and most competent authority in Bengal, can be permitted any longer to disgrace our administration. It is evident that the Court of Directors must—we might almost say will—immediately order the remaining 333 Darogahs to be placed upon 50 Rs. a month, and thus relieve themselves from the odium of being answerable for the continuation of this state of things. The Directors are not insensible to their own dignity and reputation. They well know that they are acting now in the eyes of Europe. They will reason wisely and discreetly in this matter. They will argue that it is far better to spend One lakh of Rupees in rooting out "an impolitic and demoralizing system," than to devote all their vast surplus wealth exclusively to the repayment of their loans. They will see at a single glance that five and twenty lakhs of Rupees laid out during the next five and twenty years in an endeavour to secure a vigorous and honest police, and to give internal peace and security to the people, will be more advantageous to the interests of the country than the reduction of their debt to that extent; and they will consummate the work Mr. Bird has begun.

SUPERCESSION OF MR. BLUNDELL.—We are sorry to find that the information which we had received sometime back regarding the supercession of Mr. Blundell, is correct. The last Madras paper announces that Col. Butterworth has been appointed to receive his office.

We yield to none in admiration of the mode in which Lord Ellenborough has distributed the large patronage at his disposal. Though in some instances he may appear to have committed errors, —as in the instance in which our complicated interests at the Court of Lahore were entrusted to one who had no other recommendation, than that he had improved an opportunity of exhibiting his gallantry at the head of his Regiment in Affghanistan,—yet the total disregard of all private interest, and the anxiety to reward merit, exhibited in the appointments made under his Lordship's administration, have secured the respect of society. But here our commendation must stop. The mode in which vacancies have been created, appears, in more than one instance, to be as objectionable as the mode in which they have been filled up is praise-worthy. Of this capriciousness, which can scarcely be distinguished from injustice, the case of Mr. Blundell, affords a pregnant example.

He had applied for the usual furlough to England at the close of 1841, but it was refused by Government, on the ground that his presence was required at Moulmein, while Tharawaddy lay in its neighbourhood with an army. It is generally understood—it is never denied, that when furlough has been refused by Government, the application falls to the ground, and can be revived only by the applicant himself; in other words, Government having refused to grant furlough when it was convenient to its servant to accept it, cannot enforce the acceptance of it at a subsequent period, for its own convenience. This prescriptive rule was altogether disregarded in the case of Mr. Blundell. Lord Ellenborough wanted the post of Commissioner for Major Broadfoot, and Mr. Blundell was ordered to take his furlough. He replied that it would not be convenient to him, and his successor was immediately gazetted. Just at this time, Mr. Bonham happened to resign the administration of the Straits, and Government endeavoured in some measure to redress the glaring injustice of which Mr. Blundell had been the victim, by appointing him to the vacancy. He took his departure for his Government; and last week's Calcutta Gazette announces that he received charge of it from Mr. Garling on the 3d of June. Before he had been a month in office, we learn from the Madras papers that Col. Butterworth has been appointed to supersede him. Of Col. Butterworth's fitness for such an employ, those who have the advantage of his acquaintance, speak highly. But that is neither here nor there. We speak not of the new functionary, but of the old. His double supercession, without any alleged offence or delinquency, without trial, and without conviction, is an act of injustice which reflects little credit on the Government of India. His removal in the first instance, though indefensible, is intelligible. The Governor General wanted his post to bestow as a reward for services at Jellalabad, and he was summarily and unceremoniously bundled out. There was in this case a definite object which could not be mistaken. But in the second instance of supercession, even this excuse is wanting. His place is not required to reward Col. Butterworth's services; and his dismissal can arise only from objections to him, which are personal. There may, for aught we know, be public grounds of dissatisfaction. It is said, but we do not vouch for the fact, that certain measures which he adopted while Governor of Moulmein to resist the encroachments of the Burmese, were deemed injudicious, as being calculated to involve us in a war with Tharawaddy. He made fast a rope to a rock in the Salwuen river, to prevent the timber cut by British subjects being carried over to the Burmese shore. The Burmese cut the rope at night; he renewed it, and sent some gun boats to protect it. Supposing this to be the main cause of that public displeasure which pursues him, the error, if it be one, is after all but an error of judgement; and the punishment exceeds the transgression. Besides, it must not be forgotten that the vigorous resistance of encroachments is officially meritorous or the reverse, not from its intrinsic character, but from the prevalent temper of Government at the time. To teach the Burmese to respect the rights of others, Sir Alexander Campbell burnt down Martaban—and was applauded. To teach them the same lesson and to afford protection for British interests, Mr. Blundell sends up two gun boats—and he is turned out of office. But this delinquency must have been fully known to Government when the administration of the Straits was committed to Mr. Blundell. Upon what principle then was that high office entrusted to him after he had forfeited the confidence of his superiors? If the Governor General was aware that his demerits at Moulmein were so glaring, that no punishment short of suspension from the service could meet the case, why was he elevated to a post he was not to enjoy, and put to all the inconvenience of removing to a place, where he was not to remain? He may have committed an error of judgment, —though our Government ought to have divested itself of its Burmophobia, after we had humbled to the dust the Lord paramount of Eastern Asia—but, such treatment of an old and meritorious servant of the state, is unworthy of the Government.

The Libel Case, Smyth versus Buist.—We animadverted last week on the singular inconsistencies which marked the action brought against the Editor of the Bombay Times by Mr. Smyth, the barrister, who, after having engaged in a newspaper controversy with an anonymous writer of the name of Ryut, and promised to meet him point to point, and invited the continuance of the discussion, and applauded the boldness of his spirit, at the end of eighteen months, brought an action against the Bombay Times for certain passages in Ryut's letter. But the remarks made by the Judges at the trial appear, if possible, still more singular.

The Chief Justice said he could not conceal "his disgust on finding newspapers thus rendered a vehicle for private slander. If libels such as these were published, it would lower the character of the Press, and an Editor's box in such cases might have pasted over it, "Libels taken in here, and no question asked." A more unfortunate opportunity could scarcely have been selected for this denunciation of the Press. The Editor of the Bombay Times, it was evident to the world, was as innocent as the Grand Lama, of any wish to make his paper the vehicle of slander. Mr. Smyth had gone up to Hydrabad, to collect the charges which disaffected Natives had to bring against the British Authorities. He is said to have realized 70,000 Rs. by embodying their grievances, real or supposed, in petitions. At the same time, a series of articles appeared in the Englishman, which were generally attributed to the pen or the agency of Mr. Smyth, and in which the English officers at Hydrabad, were held up to public reprobation. Rumour may in this instance have been wrong; but it is necessary to bear in mind that the paternity of these articles was ascribed to Mr. Smyth to understand why Ryut should have come forward in defence of these maligned officers, and unfolded the proceedings at Hydrabad. In his letter he stated that a native had informed him that Mr. Smyth had encouraged the resort of the disaffected by giving out that he was a relative of Lord Auckland; and that if Mr. Smyth had increased his fortune by such impositions Captain Malcolm could not be censured for desiring that he should be returned to Madras. It was the scurrility which appeared in the Englishman that called Ryut into the field. His letter was part and parcel of a controversy then raging in the newspapers. With neither party had the Editor of the Bombay Times any concern. It was not because he was ready to take in libels without asking a question, that he published this letter. Indeed the person attacked, applauded the letter and thought it innocent for eighteen months. Is it for publishing such a letter, that the Press is to be stigmatized as ready to make itself the instrument of private slander?

The letter was evidently published with no libellous intent. It appeared to fall within the line of that free discussion which makes the Press so great a blessing to society. The plaintiff himself thought so, till, as we are informed by the Madras papers, some eighteen months after, being anxious to discover the name of Ryut he thought the most ready way was to bring an action of libel against the publisher of his letter. The duty of an Editor in the admission or rejection of correspondence is as difficult, as it is dangerous. It is impossible for any man to say where free discussion ends, and libel begins. A Libel is just what the Court pronounces to be a libel. With the sliding and slippery scale of the Libel law, no public writer is safe. In the majority of instances in which he is brought before the bar of a Court, his escape or condemnation appears to be equally the result of accident. An editor not only indites his own opinions, but he publishes those of others, with a halter about his neck. It is scarcely possible with all his discretion, for him to steer clear of the hidden dangers which beset his path. These circumstances an equitable judge might have taken into consideration in commenting on what, even in its most heinous aspect, was only an act of indiscretion. But to take advantage of such an occasion to run down the Press,——

How Mr. Smyth's character as a barrister was so grievously affected by this charge, we are at a loss to conceive. As a barrister he certainly had no business at Hydrabad. It is not within the limits of the Supreme Court of Madras. He was not deputed thither on any official duty. He went there for his own special advantage, and undertook engagements which were not in the sphere of his professional duty. Upon what principle then can he claim the protection of the Court for his professional character? His professional reputation was no otherwise damaged than it would have been by any other act which affected his character as a gentleman. If he had belonged to the medical profession, and had thus embarked in exertions altogether foreign to it, could he have maintained that his professional character was attacked by such a charge of imposition? Sir Erskine Perry came to the aid of this argument of the Chief Justice, but with indifferent success. He stated that conduct which in other men would be free from all imputation would deeply degrade the high and independent character of the bar. For instance, a Clergyman or Medical man might without imputation enter familiarly into society with Attorney's wives and daughters, but this would be deemed unprofessional and unworthy on the part of a barrister. But the simile does not fit. The charge in this case is that of having obtained money on false pretences; of having raised 70,000 Rupees by pretending to be a relative of Lord Auckland. Does the learned judge intend to say that this would be as innocent in an unprofessional man as taking tea with an Attorney's wife, or dancing with an Attorney's daughter?

Sir Erskine Perry is also reported to have said that "attacks on character should be founded on truth." But is it not held as a legal maxim that the greater the truth the greater the libel? If the Editor of the Bombay Times had been able to prove that Mr. Smyth had really encouraged the resort of petitioners to him by giving out that he was Lord Auckland's relative—as he boasted to us, that he had relatives who were Peers and friends who were members of Parliament,—would not the Court have been obliged to award heavier damages?

It was also stated from the Bench that "where newspapers were mercantile speculations the interest of the proprietors, not the public benefit, were the immediate objects in view. Attacks on individuals were sure to be greedily read, and to ensure circulation." If these remarks have any bearing on the point at issue, they signify that a slander published in a newspaper which is a joint stock concern, deserves heavier punishment than one published in a paper which is the property of a single individual. Now the paper to which the letter under consideration was originally sent,—we mean the Friend of India, —belongs to a single individual. Had it appeared in this journal, and had Mr. Smyth dragged us into the Supreme Court, would the Judges have deemed it any extenuation of the offence, that the proprietor was one and indivisible, and would they have mitigated damages accordingly? We should be loth to try the experiment. All newspapers which are worth their salt, are mercantile speculations. The sole proprietor, equally with a proprietary body, brings his wares to market, and gets the best price he can for them. There is no intrinsic difference between a joint stock newspaper, and one where the pecuniary profit and responsibility belong to a single individual. The distinction is drawn where there is no difference.

Lastly, "in the Indian Press, individuals seem too willing to libel one another for their own private interests." This sentence is evidently carelessly reported; but if its design was to affirm that the Press in India is more addicted to private slander than the Press in other countries, then we would fearlessly challenge a comparison between the Indian Press and that of every other country in which the English language prevails. We may safely maintain without any dread of refutation, that no Press is more free from the guilt of propagating private slander, and of doing it for the purpose of gain, than that of this country. Public men and public measures may sometimes have been treated with little civility, and editors may have occasionally written under the impression that censure was the tax which men ought to pay to the public for being eminent, but if the Press in India is distinguished by any one feature more than by another, it is by an earnest anxiety to avoid being made the vehicle of private slander.

THE DOMAINS OF THE RAJA OF BENARES.—The oppressions under which the tenants of the Raja of Benares laboured, and which it was the object of Regulation 7, of 1828, to remove, are about to be renewed. The protection which the British Government afforded them has been suddenly removed, and they are delivered over to the tender mercies of a landlord, from whom they have nothing to hope, and every thing to fear.

When the Province of Benares was permanently settled in 1795, the Pergunahs forming the Rajah's Family domains were, in deference to his privileges, excepted from the operation of the settlement, with the understanding that the administration of justice in revenue and judicial matters, which were confided to the Rajah, should be carried on in strict accordance with the Regulations of Government. From the fact of no interior settlement having been made with the Malgoozars, the Rajah was led to assume that he, being sole Zemindar, no proprietary rights could exist under him, and that his landholders were mere Farmers and Theekadars, removable at his will and pleasure—forgetting that he was thus assuming a power which the very Government from which he derived his rights, did not itself exert, and which therefore it could not transfer to him. Under this assumed right, a system of exaction and extortion was carried on, under which by the year 1826, the demands from the Pergunah were nearly doubled, and the greater part of the ancient families expelled from their possessions. In one Pergunnah the rents were raised from Rs. 1,38,619 to Rs. 1,82,053, in another from Rs. 3,34,000 to Rs. 6,01,554.

In consequence of a simultaneous appeal to the Governor General from all the oppressed Zemindars, Mr. W. W. Bird was deputed as Commissioner in the year 1827 to investigate the complaints and it was through him that the injustice practiced towards the landholders of these tracts, by excepting them from the general settlement, was first made known. It also appeared from his report that torture to a certain extent had been applied in the realization of the Revenue.

At his recommendation, Reg. VII. of 1828 was promulgated, under which a Superintendent was appointed as an immediate controlling authority over the Rajah, and who being himself invested with the powers of a Collector of Revenue, was directed to make an interior settlement with all parties who under the Benares Regulations of 1795 could prove proprietary rights. This settlement was completed by Mr. W. H. Valpy in 1830, when the separate appointment of Superintendent was abolished and the duties made over to the Collector of Benares. It was however soon discovered that this officer, having already more work than he could accomplish, was unable to pay the requisite attention to the Rajah's domain, which almost equalled in extent the whole of his own Collectorate. The bad feeling between the Rajah's officers and the proprietors, which his almost irresponsible powers of Collector gave them constant opportunities of shewing, continued with unabated animosity, so that after repeated complaints on the part of the proprietors, the separate appointment of Superintendent was again established in the early part of 1839.

Capt. Stewart, who held a military employment at Chunar, was appointed Superintendent of the Raja's estates, to act as an intermediate agent between the oppressing landlord and the oppressed tenantry. The various complicated questions which arose between the Raja and the Gurhwars, were referred to him, and decided with such promptness and equity as to diffuse universal content through this extensive estate. During the three years preceding 1841, he had so far gained the confidence both of the Raja and the people by his abilities, assiduity and judgment, that the Board requested of Government that he might be altogether relieved from his Military duties, and thus be enabled to devote his whole time to the important civil duties committed to him. At the same time, the Board expressed their conviction that in order to secure to the people the blessings which had been procured for them at so great an expense of labour, time and money, it was absolutely necessary to continue the office of Superintendent. They stated that the Civil and fiscal Courts of the Company were so overladen with engagements as to be unable to give any adequate attention to the grievances of the people. Having established the necessity of a distinct Superintendent, they earnestly recommended that Capt. Stewart, whose ability and fitness for the employment were unquestionable, and who would be satisfied with a moderate remuneration, might be continued in the appointment. The address of the Board appears to have carried weight, for he was continued in his situation till April of the present year, when the Governor General thought fit to abolish the office altogether, because the expense, about 500 Rupees a month, which it entailed, was considered too much for the public treasury.

The poor Malgoozars are in dismay. Twice have they been rescued from the fangs of the Rajah by the interference of the British Government, and by the appointment of a Protector. They are now to be made over again to their task master and his myrmidons, and insult is added to injury by telling them to apply to the overworked British Courts for the redress of their wrongs. They have now petitioned the Governor General to continue the Superintendent, offering to defray his whole salary themselves, and begging that it may be regularly deducted from their rents. In this proposal they have shewn more wisdom than we generally observe in the natives, who are so remarkable for being pennywise and poundfoolish. Supposing their payments to be Six lakhs of Rupees a year, the sum of 6000 Rs. they now offer to pay for a Protector will amount only to one per cent; and it will be strange indeed if the Rajah, when they are left unconditionally at his mercy, should let them off under an additional squeeze of Five per cent.

Their request is in itself so reasonable and is so powerfully backed by all those public servants who are acquainted with the character of the Rajah's administration, and who know the fatal consequence of removing the Protector, that we are inclined to hope Lord Ellenborough will agree to it; for we have no hesitation in saying that we are not among the number of those who think that the strongest argument against a proposition in his Lordship's eyes, is its conformity to reason.

The petition will be found in another page.

FINAL NOTICE OF THE JOURNALS OF LADY SALE, LIEUTENANTS EYRE AND MELVILLE.—THE CAPTIVITY. The two objects which Akbar Khan appears to have set before himself, were, the expulsion of the English from Affghanistan, and the restoration of his father and his family to liberty. The first of these he expected to accomplish by the annihilation of our army; the second, by securing the persons of as many of the officers and ladies as he could, to be detained as hostages. The narratives before us afford the strongest evidence that the destruction of the force was planned and designed by him before he left Cabul, and that the murderous Ghilzies were let loose upon our troops in the defiles, by his instrumentality. The various detentions on the road, though advised by him professedly for the safety of the troops, were undeniably designed only for their more effectual destruction. It is just possible that when the Ghilzies had been glutted for four or five days with blood and plunder, he might have been unable to put a stop to their atrocities; yet he seems always to have exercised a paramount influence over them—except when it was necessary to restrain their murderous attacks. They appear to have been sufficiently acquainted with his real wishes to pay little regard to his apparent anxiety to save the troops. They understood his Pushtoo addresses too well to care a rush for his Persian speeches, which were intended for the British officers, and not for them. Having at length in six days, secured his object by the almost entire destruction of the force, and by making the officers whom he considered as most important, and the married ladies, his prisoners, his next object was to keep those prisoners alive, as hostages for the exchange of his father. Possessed of no substantive power at this time, he was too well aware of the value of the captives to allow of any thing which should endanger their safety. He treated them with some degree of kindness and consideration, and though by nature the slave of his own passions, for the gratification of which he considered no sacrifice too dear, there were moments of kindliness, in which he appeared as an angel of mercy, when compared with the generality of his own countrymen.

In the afternoon of the 9th January when the married ladies were entrusted to his care, he requested an interview with Lady Macnaghten, and expressed his sorrow at having been instrumental to her present misfortune, and his desire to contribute to her comfort while she remained his guest! None but an Affghan, accustomed to deeds of violence, would have thought of obtruding himself on the sacred privacy of a widow, with whose husband's blood his hands were still stained. She was however obliged to march in his train, on the 11th, when the whole party started about eleven o'clock, and passed over the ground which our army had traversed the preceding day, combating their enemies every inch of the way. Lt. Melville who had received five wounds and had surrendered himself to a Chief the day before, had been transferred by him to Mahomed Akbar, and now rode by his side over the scene of the previous day's slaughter. The Sirdar halted at each European body, and asked him whether it was that of a Sahib or a Gora. He recognized the bodies of Major Scott, Major Ewart, Dr. Bryce, Captains Leighton and White, and Lieut. Shaw. Lieut. Eyre says, "terrible was the spectacle presented to our eyes along the whole line of road: the snow was absolutely dyed with streaks and patches of blood for whole miles, and at every step we encountered the mangled bodies of British and Hindoostanee soldiers, and helpless camp-followers, lying side by side, victims of one treacherous undistinguishing fate, the red stream of life still trickling from many a gaping wound inflicted by the merciless Affghan knife. Here and there small groups of miserable, starving, and frost bitten wretches, among whom were many women and children, were still permitted to cling to life, perhaps only because death would in their case have been a mercy. The bodies of Majors Scott and Ewart, and of Dr. Bryce, were recognized. Numerous parties of truculent Ghazees, the chief perpetrators of these horrors, passed us laden with booty, their naked swords still reeking with the blood of their victims. They uttered deep curses and sanguinary threats at our party, and seemed disappointed that so many of the hated Feringhees should have been suffered to survive." Lady Sale says, "The sight was dreadful; the smell of the blood sickening; and the corpses, lay so thick, it was impossible to look from them, as it required some care to guide my horse so as not to tread on the bodies."

Between Tezeen and Seh Baba the party encountered the same horrifying sights as on the preceding day: "We passed the last horse artillery gun, the carriage of which had been set on fire by the Ghazies, and was still burning. The corpse of poor Dr. Cardew lay stretched beside it, with several of the artillery men. A little farther on we passed the body of Dr. Duff whose left hand had suffered previous amputation with a penknife by Dr. Harcourt." In passing the ruined enclosure at Jugdullak within which the remnant of the force had taken refuge, the spectacle was still more terrific; the whole interior space being one crowded mass of bloody corpses. "The carnage," says Lieut. Eyre, "must have been dreadful. The body of Capt. Skinner was recognized, and an Affghan was persuaded by Capt. Lawrence to inter it, with Akbar Khan's leave. This carnage it will be remembered took place, at the time when the General, after having been trepanned by Akbar Khan, was assured that every thing had been amicably settled. If such was the scene at Jugdulluk, what must have been the spectacle exhibited at the barrier, two miles on, where the most terrific slaughter of the whole march was perpetrated? That scene of horror however the captives were happily spared. Their jailor conducted them four and twenty miles in a northerly direction across the steep and difficult Udrukbudruk pass, to the fort of Kutz, which they reached at night, but not being admitted, were obliged to repose in the open air. The next day, the 15th, they crossed the Cabul river with some difficulty, but experienced the most polite attention from Mahomed Akbar. Moving in a north easterly direction they passed through the fertile valley of Lughman, studded with forts, from which both men and women issued forth, and poured a torrent of the most virulent abuse on them. At three in the afternoon, they reached the town of Turghuree, within, it was said, thirty miles of Jellalabad. Here they were allowed to halt the next day, which being Sunday, prayers were read from a Bible and Prayer Book, which had been picked up on the field at Bootkhak.

Here it became Mahomed Akbar to send the ladies and children on to Jellalabad, which he had solemnly promised to do when he received them under his protection; but nothing could be farther from his intention. On the contrary, he conveyed them eight or nine miles farther up the valley, to Buddeabad, one of the strong holds of Mahomed Shah Khan Ghilzie, the most inveterate enemy of the British, perhaps in the country. In this fort the captives remained immured from the 17th of January to the 11th of April. The treatment they experienced in this confinement was on the whole considerate. They were supplied with provisions, which, however, were cooked in a very unsavory mode. They obtained some changes of linen; they were occasionally allowed to correspond with their friends at Jellalabad; and in one instance Akbar Khan supplied them with 1000 Rs. Their accommodation was very scanty, and of comforts in the European sense of the term, they were entirely devoid. The monotony of their life was broken on the 15th of February by the arrival of Major Griffiths and Mr. Blewitt, and subsequently by that of Capt. Souter and Capt. Bygrave.

On the 19th of February they experienced that severe earthquake, which shook down the defences of Jellalabad and destroyed in one moment the labour of three months. It seems to have been felt with extraordinary severity in the valley of Buddeabad. The fort was violently shaken; the room inhabited by Lady Sale fell in. The ladies and children were saved only by rushing into the open air. General Elphinstone, being bed-ridden, was for some time in a precarious position, but was rescued by the intrepidity of his servant Moore, a private in the 44th, who rushed into his room and carried him forth in his arms. The quaking continued for several moments with unabated violence; and the shocks were afterwards repeated for a whole month, so regularly, that the day on which there was no earthquake is specially mentioned in the journal. The only other circumstance worthy of notice before the departure of the captives from this fort was the inhuman expulsion of all the unfortunate Hindoostanee camp followers, whose feet had been crippled by the frost. The atrocious Ghilzies, at the command it was supposed of Mahomed Shah Khan, dragged them out of the fort, and left them to perish miserably in the fields without food or shelter, or the consolations of human sympathy.

At length came the 7th of April, when the illustrious garrison of Jellalabad raised the siege of the town, by their own gallantry, and completely annihilated the besieging army of Akhbar Khan. The rumour of the victory reached Buddeabad on the 9th. The arrival of Mahomed Shah Khan in the evening confirmed the joyful intelligence. He had a long interview with Major Pottinger, who endeavoured to propose terms for the release of the prisoners. The Khan however would not listen to them for a moment, but said we must follow the Sirdar's fortune, who would start for the hills the next morning. The poor captives now prepared to leave their dreary prison, and bid adieu to its grim walls, of twenty-five feet in height; but they were not to pass unfleeced. The hospitable Mahomed Shah Khan first selected all the best horses for himself, and then robbed Lady Macnaghten of shawls, to the value of 5000*l.* and of jewels estimated at 10,000*l.* The prisoners finally left the fort on the morning of the 11th of April, and were conveyed about for five days in the train of Akbar Khan, in the most miserable conveyances, over terrific defiles, and heated sands, exposed to every inconvenience through the day, and lodged at night in the most wretched tents. Capt. Lawrence remonstrated with the Sirdar against dragging the ladies and children with him over such a country, when they were so ill able to bear up against fatigue and exposure, but the good Samaritan was inexorable. At length there was a halt for three days, to enable the Sirdar to regulate his movements, for his influence had been all but annihilated by his defeat. On the 19th, though it rained heavily, the captives were obliged to march sixteen miles to Tezeen. At Seh Baba they encountered a putrid smell from the decomposed bodies of their murdered companions. At Tezeen they were lodged in another fort of Mahomed Shah's, which had been shaken to its foundation by the earthquake. The females of his family cooked a dinner for the captive ladies, and the whole party, large and small, in number thirty-four, were closely packed at night in a room 15 feet by 12, with a wood fire in the centre, and pine torches for candles. The day after the arrival of the party at Tezeen, Mrs. Waller was delivered of a daughter. This was the fourth addition to the number of captives since they had lost their liberty, Mrs. Boyd, Mrs. Riley, and a soldier's wife of the name of Bourne, having been confined at Buddeabad. In no respect was the mercy of Divine Providence more manifest during the captivity than in the preservation of the females, while they were thus exposed to the utmost extremity of hardship, in the most delicate circumstances.

On the 21st of April, the Sirdar held a levee, —Major Pottinger being present,—at which he burst out into a violent passion, and declared that his own countrymen had basely deserted and betrayed him, though he had all along acted at the instigation of the Chiefs at Cabul, especially in the murder of the Envoy and the destruction of the army; yet these very men now refused to support him, and he solemnly swore that if ever he had the power, he would make a severe example of them. This speech serves to corroborate the statement, that the destruction of the army was not the spontaneous ebullition of Ghilzie ferocity, though they doubtless rejoiced in so unusual an opportunity of indulging their natural passion for blood and plunder. It was Akbar who kindled that fire in their bosoms which he may afterwards have been anxious to extinguish when he found it raging too fiercely for his own purposes. The fact that he appeared at Cabul before the assembled Chiefs on the [illegible] of January, booted and spurred, and stated that he was going to slay the Feringee Dogs; and that on the passage of the troops through the Khoord Cabul, on the 8th, he followed with some Chiefs in the rear, and called to the Ghilzies, in Persian to desist from, and in Pushtoo to continue, firing, explains the whole mystery of the massacre, and places his treachery beyond doubt.

The captives remained at Tezeen on the 20th and 21st of April. Early in the morning of the 22d, an unusual bustle was visible. The keeper was roused from his slumbers. A message had arrived from Cabul to say that Futteh Jung was about to rescue the captives with 400 horse. They were immediately removed in two parties. General Elphinstone, Major Pottinger, Capt. Mackenzie and Dr. Magrath, with Capt.

and Mrs. Waller and Capt. and Mrs. Eyre, were sent to a fort two miles higher up the valley. The rest of the ladies and gentlemen were despatched up the Zunduk valley near the Aman Koh, about eight miles south of Tezeen. This sudden movement proved the death of General Elphinstone. When the party was removed from Buddeabad he was so weak as to be scarcely able to sit on horseback, yet he was brutally dragged for several days over the most terrific passes and defiles, exposed to every inconvenience and hardship. At Tezeen, he was so weak as to be unable to stand, yet he was constrained to ride on horseback, and the day after, the 23d, he was released from all bodily suffering and mental anguish. His body was placed in a framework rudely put together by an Affghan carpenter, and sent down to Jellalabad, under charge of a European soldier, disguised as a native. But the progress of the body was interrupted by the savage Ghilzies, who opened the case, stripped the body of the General, pelted it with stones, and would have burned it but for the remonstrances of the Sirdar's men, who at length succeeded in conveying it to Jellalabad, where it was interred with due military honors.

On the same day, the 23d April, on which the General expired, intelligence arrived that the people of Cabul were deserting it in great numbers, from dread of our army, and that all efforts to induce the people to oppose General Pollock's advance, were fruitless. This information at once decided Mahomed Akbar to send Capt. Mackenzie to treat with General Pollock without delay, and though we had already paid dearly enough in our previous attempts to negotiate with him, overtures continued to be received and made for four months, from April to August, at the most precious season of the year, when, had our armies marched at once to Cabul from Candahar and Jellalabad, they would have encountered no obstacles; their progress would have been a bloodless triumph, and the miseries of the captives might have been abridged by two months.

The captives remained in the Zunduk valley for a month. Their situation appears to have been as comfortable as could have been expected in so wild a region. They enjoyed considerable freedom, and not a little kindness from their keepers. Their minds were occasionally cheered by correspondence with their friends at Jellalabad, and their feelings soothed by the tokens of kindness they received in the despatch of various articles of food and dress from our camp. Meanwhile Mahomed Akbar, whose prospects seemed to have been for ever blighted by his memorable defeat on the 7th of April, had risen stronger from his fall, and had gradually acquired such authority at Cabul, by the native force of his genius, as to be able to send for the captives to be lodged in the vicinity of his own encampment, without the fear of a rescue. On the 23d of May, they left the Zunduk valley and traced their way to the foot of the Huft Kotul, or hill of seven ascents. Here they once more encountered the putrid bodies of their slaughtered companions in arms, which strewed the way to Khoord Cabul, and posioned the atmosphere. A little beyond Kubbur-i-jubber they passed two caves on opposite sides of the road, filled with rotten carcases. From thence to Tungee Tureekee the sight become more and more awful. Their conductor asked Lieut. Eyre, whether this would not excite the fury of General Pollock's army, and he was told that he need not be surprized if every house in Cabul was levelled with the ground. The Khoord Cabul pass, was found to be absolutely impassable from the stench of dead bodies. It will be remembered, that it was in the ascent of this pass, that Mahomed Akbar urged on the slaughter in Pushtoo, while he forbad it in Persian, and that three thousand of our soldiers and followers were slain. The party, unable to move down this pass, took the direct road to Cabul, having the column of Alexander the Great full in view all the way. On reaching this classic spot, a scene of unparalleled magnificence burst on their view. "At the distance of some two thousand feet below, the whole picturesque and highly cultivated valley of Cabul was spread before us like a map: the towering mountain ranges of Kohistan and Hindoo Khoosh, clad in a pure vesture of snow, bounded the horizon, at the distance of nearly a hundred miles. The Bala Hissar was dimly discernible in the distance, from whose battlements the roar of cannon broke ever and anon upon the ear, betokening the prolongation of the strife between hostile tribes and ambitious chiefs."

The fort in which the prisoners were now confined was three miles distant from Cabul, and close to the Logur river. They entered it on the 24th of May and continued to occupy it for three months to the 25th of August, when they were transported to Bameean, on the approach of our armies. They appear to have enjoyed more freedom and comfort there, than in either of their previous jails. The fort furnished sufficient accommodation to admit of the ladies and gentlemen enjoying the luxury of distinct apartments. The monotony of their existence was broken from time to time by reports from the city of the gradual progress of Akbar's accession to power, and from the camp of the advance of our army; which latter information was less substantial than the former. The successive journies of Capts. Mackenzie, Troup and Lawrence to Jellalabad, with the proposal of terms from Akbar Khan, kept the captives in a state of feverish anxiety, their joys rising and falling as the prospect of deliverance appeared to approach or to fly from them. It was during these three months, while Cabul was distracted with factions, and the Chiefs were quarrelling with each other, that the advance of our army might have been effected without resistance. Had General Nott advanced towards Cabul as soon as he had received the reinforcements brought by Brigadier England, and General Pollock moved up simultaneously, with the cattle then in the camp, and with which alone he was obliged eventually to take the field, an easy triumph would have attended our arms. This fact, which has hitherto rested on conjecture, is now abundantly confirmed by the journals before us, which disclose the actual state of things at the capital during this period of our inglorious inactivity. As matters turned up, our triumph was more decisive and perhaps more salutary, from its having been achieved after the resources of the country had been collected by Akbar Khan to obstruct our advance; but it will ever be a matter of censure, that the progress of our armies was protracted till opposition had been organized under an able leader, and till the near approach of winter exposed our troops to the additional risks of the climate, the rigour of which had already annihilated one army.

On the 18th of July, Lady Macnaghten had part of her jewels restored to her by Mahomed Shah Khan, in a sadly broken condition. He had endeavoured to raise money upon them in the city, without success, and now made a merit of returning them, but the shawls were too valuable to be given up. On the 24th of July Major Pottinger received intimation from Jellalabad, that his political functions had ceased, and that he was in no way to interfere with any future arrangements which might be entered into regarding the captives. Surely, his eminent services at Herat and Charekar, his noble conduct at the Council of War, when he alone stood up for the maintenance of our national dignity, combined with his sufferings, ought to have protected him from a procedure calculated so deeply to wound his feelings. On the 27th, Capt. Troup returned from Jellalabad with intelligence that Lord Ellenborough had ordered the negotiations to be broken off, and the army to march to Cabul. The announcement of this fact, threw the Sirdar into a paroxysm of rage and he declared that the first movement of the army to Cabul should be the signal for the removal of the captives to Toorkistan, where he would distribute them as slaves among the Chiefs. He resolved however to make one last effort at negotiation. Capts. Lawrence and Troup were deputed that night to Jellalabad. The captives however who knew that nothing could arrest the progress of our armies, now made up their minds for death or slavery, for although they had been told, that the Affghan Chiefs would not permit their removal, the power of Akbar appeared too firm for them to indulge the hope of a rescue. While the two officers were at Jellalabad, Capt. John Conolly, was carried off after five days illness. Mahomed Akbar promised to send his body for burial to Jellalabad; but on Major Pottinger's sending to enquire when it was to start, Akbar replied that till General Pollock made peace, neither living nor dead should be suffered to go. The body was therefore buried in the garden adjoining the fort.

On the 9th of August, Captains Troup and Lawrence returned from General Pollock's camp, and the next morning informed the captives that their mission had led to no result. The General demanded that all the prisoners should be sent down immediately; and Akbar positively refused to do so without a written engagement. On the 12th, Major Pottinger with the five hostages were turned out "bag and baggage" from the Bala Hissar, by command of Akbar, who told his people to "take those dogs away." On the 23d, the party was unexpectedly gratified by the arrival of the Ghuzni prisoners, nine in number, whom Akbar had gotten into his own power during the absence of Shumsooddeen. On comparing notes, it was found that the treatment experienced by the captives of Ghuzni had been far more severe and truculent, than that of the prisoners who had fallen into Akbar's hands. Two days after, on the 25th of August, the last rays of hope vanished from the minds of the unhappy prisoners. They were informed that they should probably march that night for Toorkistan, where hopeless slavery awaited them. In vain did they indulge the faint prospect of a rescue during the day. They knew that no one had the energy to attempt it, and the gloomy day was passed in packing up a few necessaries. In the evening, Capt. Troup was sent to see them off. Capt. Bygrave was ordered to be in personal attendance on the Sirdar. Mrs. Anderson and Mrs. Trevor, who were too ill to undertake the journey without exposing themselves to certain death, were left behind with Dr. Campbell for their medical attendant. The rest, sick or well, were obliged to start at half past ten that night for Bameean, under the command of Saleh Mahomed, with an escort of between 3 and 400 men. As the ladies were now going into unknown regions, where it would be advisable to attract as little notice as possible, they adopted the national dress. Their road lay through scenes of beauty and sublimity which at another season would not have failed to call forth their admiration. They reached Bameean on the 3d. of September. The accommodation in the fort was such as they would not have selected for their dogs; still they enjoyed more freedom than they had ever done, and Lady Sale and Lieut. Eyre made excursions to the caves.

On the 11th of September came the crisis which they had so long anticipated with dread. A decisive order was received from Mahomed Akbar for their immediate removal to Koolloom, where they would have been placed beyond the reach of our victorious armies. But Saleh Mahomed their jailor, was not impervious to money. He had formerly been in the Shah's service in Capt. Hopkins' regiment, and had deserted to Dost Mahomed in this same neighbourhood. The indefatigable Mohun Lall, had sent a messenger after him from Cabul, one Morteza Khan, to promise him the most liberal rewards if he would permit the release of the prisoners. This had prepared his mind to receive with complacency the proposals which Major Pottinger had whispered in his ear. On the morning of the 11th, Captain Lawrence asked the use of Lady Sale's room for a conference, as being the most private. There Mohun Lall's envoy, Morteza Khan and Saleh Mahomed met Major Pottinger, and Capts. Lawrence, Johnson, Mackenzie and Webb, and in the course of an hour the business was settled. Saleh Mahomed agreed to make over all his prisoners on condition of receiving 20,000 Rupees in ready cash, and 1000 Rs. a month for life. The officers (Capt. Webb excepted,) put their names to the agreement; and all the other prisoners signed an agreement by which they pledged themselves to hold the four officers harmless, if Government refused to sanction the expenditure.

The next morning the 12th, Saleh Mahomed hoisted the flag of defiance. As money was wanted, a cafila from Bokhara was intercepted, and 400 Rupees levied by way of tax. Major Pottinger next adopted the bold step of appointing a new Governor of the province in the name of the British Government; and presents and promises were distributed among the neighbouring chiefs. The most energetic measures were now adopted. The Meer Akhor, a confidential servant of Akbar Khan, who had been sent with the party, and who was entirely devoted to his master's interests. on seeing this turn of affairs, moved off with his 100 Ghilzie horse, and there was little doubt that he would soon bring his master down on the fort. It was resolved therefore to put it into a state of defence. A subscription of 500 Rupees was raised among the prisoners as a fund for provisioning the garrison. Saleh Mahomed busied himself in laying in provisions. The water was turned into ditches, and every preparation was made to stand a siege. Major Pottinger exerted himself again as he had done at Herat. "It would be injustice," says Lady Sale, "to Major Pottinger not to mention the active part he took in affairs. From his perfect knowledge of the Persian language, and his acquaintance with the manners and customs of the people, he well knew how to manage them, and to take advantage of the slightest opening on their part in our favour. His coolness and decision were only equalled by the promptness with which he met the wishes of the chiefs; giving them burats on the neighbouring lands, empowering them to receive the government rents, &c.; all which documents, though he executed them with an air of great condescension and with the gravity of a judge, he well knew were mere pieces of waste paper: yet they had a magic charm for the time; which was all we required."

On the 15th intelligence arrived that General Nott had taken and destroyed Ghuzni, that General Pollock was approaching Cabul, and that Akbar Khan was supposed to have fled to Kohistan. Saleh Mahomed thought the time had now arrived when the party might commence their journey to Cabul with safety, and he determined to start the next morning. On the 16th, they commenced their march towards Cabul, not however without deep anxiety, for they knew that the Meer Akhor had joined his master Akbar, and announced the entire frustration of his plans. For aught they knew, the Sirdar himself might be in the neighbourhood, and endeavour to regain his captives. It was with hearts fluttering between hope and anxiety that they issued from their cheerless prison, and at sunrise commenced their flight. Every horseman they met on the road was suspected to be the avant courier of their enemy. The day however passed without any attempt to interrupt them, and they encamped at Killa topchee. At two in the morning, they were roused by the arrival of a messenger from Sir Richmond Shakespear with a letter—the most exhilarating they had received for ten months—stating that he had advanced to Sir-i-chusm on his way to their relief, with Six hundred Kuzzilbash horsemen. The next morning, the 17th, they marched eleven miles to the foot of the Kaloo pass, and then crossed that stupendous mountain, which is within a thousand feet as high as Mont Blanc, and had rested a couple of hours, when a body of horse was descried descending in the valley down the distant pass of Hajeejuk. In an instant all were on the alert to catch a glimpse of their liberators; and they soon recognized the friendly banner of the Kuzzilbashes streaming in the air. A few minutes more of eager suspense elapsed, when Sir Richmond galloping up to the party, congratulated them on their liberation, and dispelled every doubt. "At length," says Lieut. Eyre, "we felt the blessed assurance of freedom; the heavy burden which had oppressed our hearts for nine tedious months was removed; and from that moment we were altered beings. Our gallant countryman was greeted on our side with no boisterous cheers of triumph, for all seemed alike conscious that the utterance of such sounds would but inaptly express the deep feelings of gratitude, that agitated our inmost hearts. Our joy was too great, too overwhelming, for the tongue to utter, as it is for my feeble pen to describe. That we should have escaped unhurt, with so many delicate women, young children, and tender infants, through such numerous perils, fatigues, and privations, and above all, from the hands of such merciless enemies as Akbar Khan and his Giljye confederates, seemed at first too much for the senses to realize; nor could even the most thoughtless among us fail to recognize and acknowledge, in all that had befallen us, the distinguishing grace and protecting providence of a forbearing and merciful God."

As Mahomed Akbar was still at large with many of his powerful chieftains, it seemed probable that he would make an effort to recover his lost prisoners. Sir Richmond therefore lost no time in forwarding a request to General Pollock that troops might be sent to their aid. On the 18th and 19th May they continued their march, and at night obtained information that a hostile chief with a thousand followers had reached Kaloo to intercept their flight, a short time after their departure. At early dawn on the 20th September, they started for Argundee, distant twenty-five miles, where they had every hope of meeting a British force. They had not proceeded far when a horseman arrived with a note to say that General Sale was close at hand with his Brigade. A party of Sultan Jan's men were in the neighbourhood, and some Kokhees were driven off by the Jezailchees, so that as Lady Sale observes, "had they not received assistance their recapture was certain; but as it was, they dared not attack the force they saw. It is impossible to express our feelings on Sale's approach. To my daughter and myself, happiness so long delayed, as to be almost unexpected, was actually painful, and accompanied by a choking sensation, which could not obtain the relief of tears. When we arrived where the infantry were posted, they cheered all the captives as they passed them; and the men of the 13th pressed forward to welcome us individually. Most of the men had a little word of hearty congratulation to offer, each in his own style, on the restoration of his Colonel's wife and daughter: and then my highly-wrought feelings found the desired relief; and I could scarcely speak to thank the soldiers for their sympathy, whilst the long withheld tears now found their course. On arriving at the camp, Capt. Backhouse fired a royal salute from his mountain train guns: and not only our old friends, but all the officers in the party, came to offer congratulations, and welcome our return from captivity."

We close this protracted review with Lieut. Eyre's remarks on this scene, than which nothing more striking, more romantic, more thrilling is to be found in all the works of fiction. "All doubt was now at an end; we were once more under the safeguard of British troops: Gen. Sale was there in person; and his happiness at regaining his long lost wife and daughter can be imagined; the gallant veteran's countenance was an index of his feelings, and apathetic indeed must have been the heart that failed to sympathize with his holy joy. The camp was still a few miles further on, and we formed a procession of glad spirits as we moved along towards the pass of Suffed-Kak, whose heights we could discern crowned with British bayonets. These we found to be a part of the brave 13th Light Infantry, who, as the ladies successively ascended the hill, raised three hearty cheers to each of them,—sounds never to be forgotten, producing a thrill of ecstasy through the whole frame. The Mountain guns, under Capt. Backhouse, wound up the scene with a royal salute. Fervent were our aspirations of praise to Heaven at this happy, and of late unlooked for, termination of all our hardships and anxieties. Surely never has the hand of Providence been more clearly discernible, than in the wonderful preservation of so many ladies and children, through scenes of a nature to quail the stoutest heart and injure the strongest constitution; but more particularly in restraining the wrath of savage men, whose intense hatred of us was only equalled by their unscrupulous cruelty, and who longed to wreak their revenge upon us for the wrongs, whether real or fancied, that they had suffered at the hands of our nation."

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JULY 6.

— Last night's Gazette publishes an official despatch from Sir Charles Napier, relative to the operations of Lieut. Anderson. His Excellency states that Shere Mahomed, finding he could not recruit his troops in Scinde, resolved to draw reinforcements from the mountains of Belochistan. Lieut. Anderson was therefore sent with a steamer and a hundred men to destroy the boats collected on the right bank for the Belochees to cross over into Scinde. This officer has performed his duty in a brilliant manner. Yet on turning to Lieut. Anderson's despatch, we find that he says nothing of having destroyed any boats, but alludes only to an engagement with the Belochees who had assembled to the number of 300. They were soon driven away; and the Steamer kept up a splendid fire of grape shot, killing and wounding it is supposed 140, or nearly half the number. One or two such attacks from the ubiquitous steamer, will soon teach the Belochees that it is safer to keep to their mountains; in which case the tranquillity of Scinde will be an easy work. Here again do we perceive the vast advantages which Government derives from the agency of Steam.

— The President of the United States, reposing especial trust and confidence in the abilities and integrity of Mr. James B. Higginson has appointed him Consul of the United States in the Port of Calcutta. The French had already the start of America in this matter of a Consul. It is singular that Calcutta should for so many years have been the only port of importance in which no foreign nation thought it necessary to appoint a Consul.

— Mr. Montriou, a member of the bar of Calcutta, who has just been appointed one of its Magistrates has, it is said, introduced a novel practise into the Court, which will probably give rise to some observations. It has been the custom hitherto for petitions to be presented in writing to the Magistrate. He has directed that they shall in future be made orally. If Mr. Montriou, were as strong in the Oriental languages as his colleague Mr. Blacquiere, the innovation might have been tolerable, though from the peculiar habits of the people, likely to occasion some injustice. But it appears preposterous that all petitions should be addressed by word of mouth to one who does not understand the language.

— The Bengal Bank, has just declared a dividend for the last six months at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum.

FRIDAY, JULY 7.

— The Madras papers announce that Col. Butterworth, the Deputy Quarter Master of the Army, has been appointed Governor of the Straits' Settlements.

— Mr. A. G. Paterson, the Deputy Secretary of the Union Bank, is about to proceed to Singapore on business connected with that institution. Mr. Calder Stewart acts for him in the mean time at the Bank.

— The Star states on good authority, that Dost Mahomed had obtained the complete ascendancy at Cabul, and that all those chiefs who were at first opposed to him have succumbed. This was to have been expected. There was no party strong enough to oppose him; and it was for the interests of the people to support the only individual who was capable of establishing a strong Government. Candahar is in a state of great distraction. All those who had manifested any good will towards the English, had been plundered, and were about to fly. It has, we fear, fared ill with that large number of Hindoostanee servants who accompanied our army, but having become domesticated, refused to quit their new connections in the country and remained behind.

— The insurrection of Ali Mahomed to the north of Sukkur does not appear likely to be serious. He declares it to be his wish in all things to submit to our Government. He has taken up arms only to oppose the usurpation of his territories by Ali Morad, the British ally, to whom it is said Sir Charles Napier has incautiously made over large estates belonging even to those who were friendly to our rule. Ali Mahomed has never interrupted our dawks, which is the first thing he would have done had he been hostilely disposed.

SATURDAY, JULY 8.

— We regret to find the death of the Honourable George Turnour, late Acting Colonial Secretary, announced in the Ceylon papers. If we mistake not, this is the gentleman who has been so successful in tracing out the ancient history of that island and of Boodhism, from Pali records.

— There is a report in Calcutta that Lord Ellenborough goes home in the Endymion frigate, but it is certain that no one knows any thing of his Lordship's movements; and it is probable that he himself does not know the next move he will take. The intelligence by the next mail will, it is said, decide the point of his continuance or return. It will probably decide nothing. If the Gate and other Proclamations, did not drive his Lordship from India, certainly the conquest of Scinde will not. His Lordship reached Gazeepore with his suite on the 1st Instant.

— The papers announce the death of Major General Hopper, of the Artillery, at Dum Dum in consequence chiefly of an accident which occurred to him a month ago, and which at his very advanced age proved fatal. The General had been not less than sixty years in the service, having come out during the administration of Warren Hastings. He had attained the age of 78.

— We are most happy to announce that the carriage of the Governor of Madras, which was submerged in going from the ship to the shore, has been fished up. A survey was immediately held thereon,—we suppose for the comfort of the underwriters.

MONDAY, JULY 10.

— The Star states that the Governor General's party reached Dinapore on Monday, the 3d Instant.

— Singapore papers have been received to the 8th of June. They give us but little intelligence, because there is but little to give. They however mention a report that the Plenipotentiary had been invited to Pekin as a more convenient position for the settlement of affairs.

— In two instances within the last week, deaths have been announced in the papers which have not occurred. It is scarcely possible to reprobate so detestable a hoax in too strong language; and we trust that if the miscreants should ever be detected, they will be visited with the utmost severity the law can inflict.

— The Madras Athenæum says, it is the intention of Mr. Smyth to return to the Bombay Times the amount of damages awarded against him. The Times of course has spirit enough to refuse such an offer with the scorn it deserves. It is stated that Mr. Smyth's object in bringing the action at the end of eighteen months, was a hope that the threat of it would have induced the Editor to give up the author. The Star very properly observes, that to pay the costs as well as to relinquish the damages, would be the proper way of confessing the error into which the prosecutor had been led.

— The Agra Ukhbar states, that Dost Mahomed Khan had demanded of Ameenoolla all the plunder he had obtained during the war with the English, but that he had refused to give it up. Khan Shereen Khan, the head of the Kuzilbashes, had arrived at Cabul and had an interview with the Dost, who endeavoured to conciliate him, but he had returned to the hills. Mahomed Akbar Khan was busy in rebuilding Jellalabad, and settling the country.

— The British Resident at Gwalior left that place on the 16th. The Deputy Vakeel, who accompanied him from the Durbar, was not permitted to cross the Chumbul. The Resident dismissed him. It is now confidently affirmed, that the Resident was not expelled by the Usurper; but that the Baee on the contrary used every effort to retain him. Then why did he leave the Court? The residence of our Envoy at the Native Courts should be regulated by the same rules which prevail in Europe. His departure should be the signal for a war, and he should not depart till his Government is prepared to enter on hostilities.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that Mr. G. Thompson was to remain at Delhi two months and that a thousand Rupees had been laid out in putting a house in order for him. It is affirmed, though on what authority we know not, that the members of the Imperial family have been called to contribute to the embassy, and have reluctantly paid 7,000 Rupees.

— The Hurkaru states that the office of the Principal Casy of the Bengal Presidency has become vacant by the death of the incumbent, and that it is the intention of Government, to reduce the salary from 650 Rupees a month to 300. We copy an article on the subject from the Hurkaru, who recommends that the whole system of Criminal law should be altered. Why, it was for this very object that the Law Commission was constituted; and the only attempt it made at legislation was the production of a Criminal Code, which shared the odium attached in this country to its chief contributor, and has never been noticed since it was printed and reviewed six years ago. We want an entirely new Code of Criminal Law; but if Government could not obtain one that it could adopt, even at an expense of ten lakhs of Rupees, how can we ever hope for one?

— The Bombay Times in noticing that rumours have been abroad for some time that Sir Henry Pottinger was labouring under disease which would shortly constrain him to leave his post, states that the very last letters from him make no mention whatever of any such complaint.

TUESDAY, JULY 11.

— The four Steamers, with four other vessels in tow, having on board the Governor General and his suite, were at Monghir on the 5th, and are expected this day at Barrackpore, where every preparation has been made for his Lordship's reception.

— Another case of libel has just been tried at Bombay. Some time last year the Eleanor, Captain Holderness, ran ashore at Aleppee and was burnt. Capt. Johnson of the Trey, who was in the road stead at the time, was publicly charged by Captain Holderness with having neglected to afford him any assistance. Capt. Johnson in his own defence published a letter in the Hurkaru, stating that he went on board the Eleanor when she was aground, but found that he was not wanted, and returned to his own vessel. In that letter he insinuated that the Eleanor had been run ashore and set on fire designedly, to defraud the Insurance offices. The Court found the libel proved, and awarded damages to the extent of 1500 Rupees.

— The accounts from Gwalior extend to the 24th of June. We have copied an article from the Agra Ukhbar, which depicts the miserable condition to which the Christians in the Gwalior army have been reduced. We cannot however believe that the Usurper has been so insane as to advise the Pindara chiefs to pillage the countries subordinate to the British Government, and to station troops on the Chumbul to oppose the advance of any English army. One single act of unequivocal hostility to the British Government, and his usurpation is at an end.

— The Madras Bank was to have commenced business on the 1st of the present month. We perceive that some of the Bombay papers have charged it on the misconduct of the Bengal Government that it did not open earlier. The unavoidable cause of delay, as we have stated, was the absence of the Governor General from the Legislative Council.

— The Madras United Service Gazette states that Col. Smith of the 2d Cavalry killed no fewer than eleven tigers on his way from Kamptee to Secundrabad.

— The Agra Ukhbar publishes intelligence from Scinde, which leads to the impression that the case of Sheer Mahomed is desperate, and that our troops will not be much longer kept out in tents at so inclement a season, exposed at once to insufferable heat, and dreadful inundation. It is said that on the report of Col. Roberts' force being in his rear, Shere Mahomed resolved to attack it, but several of his adherents falling off, he was obliged to "run for it." He had only 5 or 600 men with him, and it is supposed that the line of his flight will cross the south of Capt. Jacob's force and this may lead to his apprehension.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 12.

— The City of Madras is agitated by two events; the commercial community by the election,—through the public influence it is said—of Mr. S. D. Birch, as Secretary to the new Chartered Bank of Madras, which has been set a going at last. The bar is indignant at the appointment of Mr. Serle, as Registrar, by the Chief Justice Sir Edward Gambier; and some very stringent resolutions have been adopted. The matter will lead to an open schism between the bench and the bar. The Attorney General made some observations about a criminal indictment. The Chief Justice told him to adopt what course he chose, and in reply to some other observations which had been made said that the bench could maintain its own dignity and respectability without the aid of the bar. This announcement caused some laughter among the gentlemen of the bar.

— The following is the latest account of the progress of the Governor General.

9th July.— The Governor General reached Moorshedabad last night. This morning he landed at Berhampore, and like a good Christian attended church. A salute of 19 guns notified his presence in the Cantonments, and this evening his Lordship entertains General Raper, Col. Foord, his Staff, and the Civilians. To-morrow he will retrace his steps on a visit to the Nawaub Nazim, who has invited the whole gentlemen of the station of Berhampore to meet him at dinner. Rumour says it is his Lordship's wish to establish once more an European Regiment here—and for that purpose he intends visiting the Barracks having directed the Executive Officer and the Station Staff to be in attendance. Better Barracks India does not boast, and in spite of prejudice, the station itself is delightful. His Lordship leaves us for Calcutta on Tuesday morning. You shall here further from me about the party."—Eng.

---

His Lordship reached Barrackpore at four o'clock this evening. He was saluted first from the Danish battery at Serampore, and on landing at Barrackpore by the artillery brought up from Dum-Dum for the occasion.

PROMOTION OF DAROGAHS.

From Under Secretary to the Government of Bengal to the Superintendent of Police Lower Provinces and the Commissioners of Cuttack, Assam, Arracan and the Tenasserim Provinces, &c. dated Fort William, 19th June, 1843.

1. I am directed to forward for your information the accompanying copies of correspondence noted in the Margin,* relating to a proposition emanating from the Government of Bengal and sanctioned by the Supreme Government for improving the character and efficiency of the Police in this Presidency by holding out incentives to emulation among those of the higher grades.

2. You will observe that no Thannah Darogah is to receive less than 25 Rupees salary per mensem, and it is therefore requisite that you should in the first place cause the preparation of a statement shewing how many officers of that grade in the districts under you are in receipt of monthly allowances, below Rupees 25. This statement should be forwarded to this office without delay, in order that the necessary information may be communicated to the offices of audit and account to pass the increase in the bills of Establishment, commencing from the 1st proximo.

3. With regard to the three higher grades of Daroghas who are to receive salaries of Rs. 50, Rs. 75, and Rs. 100, respectively, you are requested, after making the most careful enquiries concerning those with whose character you are not personally acquainted, and with the strictest regard to merit, and faithful service, to submit a list of those whom you recommend for promotion to the higher ranks, specifying the degree which in your opinion each one deserves to obtain.

4. It is not intended that the full complement of these three classes should be appointed at once unless there be men of real merit to fill the places. Nor is it necessary, that the distribution of promotion should be made with perfect equality in the several districts, such being impossible in a scheme where qualification is the test for advancement. But it will be advisable as far as it can be done without occasioning too many removals and consequent detriment to the public service, to distribute the officers, so that there may be at least one or two of the three first classes in each district. Accordingly where none of the local Police are by merit entitled to promotion, you are recommended to transfer more deserving officers thereto, avoiding, if possible, to send the latter to places less desirable than those they have hitherto served in.

5. Considering how important it will be to mark whether the advantages now held out will produce the benefits contemplated, the Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal requests you will report concisely the case of every Darogah elected for promotion under this order, as well as of those who may hereafter be dismissed for misconduct, for the consideration and orders of Government.

6. This measure for the improvement of the Police of Bengal being experimental, His Honor the Deputy Governor requests that you will also report from time to time such circumstances as may enable him to judge how far its extension is desirable, and whether it succeeds in promoting the object in view by raising the character and increasing the usefulness of the class of officers intended to be affected by it.

7. I am further directed to acquaint you that this Circular and the correspondence which accompanies it, will be published in the Bengalee Gazette, for the information of the classes chiefly concerned.

No. 754.

From F. J. Halliday, Esq. Secretary to the Government of Bengal, to T. R. Davidson, Esq. Officiating Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department, dated Fort William, 17th May, 1843.

1. With reference to the communication from your office, No. 12, of 17th Feb. last, in reply to mine of the 6th Idem, No. 210, sanctioning the presentation of a Doshalla by way of reward to the Peishkar of the Magistrate's Court of Tipperah, for meritorious exertions towards the conviction of certain heinous offenders, I am directed by the Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal to transmit for the purpose of being laid before the Honourable the President in Council, the accompanying letter in original from the Superintendent of Police. No. 647 of 31st March last, recommending the bestowal of similar rewards on two Police Darogahs, who have for a considerable period distinguished themselves by their successful exertions in the duties of their situations.

2. It has not appeared to the Deputy Governor advisable to support Mr. Dampier's recommendation in this particular instance; but that Officer's remark on his inability to bestow any reward on deserving Officers of this class, and thus encourage them to persevere and stimulate others to follow their example, seems to His Honor worthy of attentive consideration.

3. It is needless to occupy the time of his Honor in Council with the numerous quotations which might be adduced to shew the extent and force of opinion which have prevailed among the most experienced persons in the country regarding the inadequacy of the pay of a Darogah or Thannadar of Police compared with the services required of him and the power with which he is invested. The Report of the late Police Committee is sufficient on this point. Not only however is his actual pay inadequate for his remuneration, but he has no prospect of any advancement or promotion to which he might look for the reward of peculiar exertions. Hence doubtless the almost universal corruption among Officers of this class; the distrust with which they are regarded by their European Superiors; and the apprehension which they excite, instead of a sense of Security in the minds of the people they are appointed to protect.

4. It is, His Honour firmly believes, vain to expect improvement of Police while these its most important functionaries are under the influence of so impolitic and demoralizing a system; and though a general improvement of their position in respect of salary long since admitted to be necessary, must unavoidably await a more flourishing state of the general finances, it may nevertheless be possible without any serious addition to expenditure, to effect a partial amendment and at all events to place before the functionaries in question some incentive however inconsiderable, to activity and zeal, and some reward, though less than may be entirely sufficient, for probity and successful exertion.

5. For this purpose, it has occurred to the Deputy Governor, that the Supreme Government might not be unwilling to permit him to hold out to Darogahs of Police a prospect of gradual increase of salary on the ground of merit and service alone rising from 25 Rs. a month, the ordinary salary now given, to 50; thence to 75; and thence in rarer cases to 100.

6. It might be imposed as a restriction upon the expense which this measure would cause that the number of Darogahs promoted to each grade should never exceed a certain proportion of their whole number; and the promotions being made on the sole ground above referred to, it would not be necessary or indeed likely, that the full proportion allowed should receive the higher allowances. For instance, there are now altogether 508 Thannah Darogahs, of whom 1 draws 100 Rs. monthly; 2, Rs. 50; 1, Rs. 45; 6, Rs. 40; 2, Rs. 35; 5, Rs. 31-5-7; 1, Rs. 31-2; 95, Rs. 30; 20, Rs. 26-2; 361, Rs. 25; 5, Rs. 20; 2, Rs. 16; 7, Rs. 15. Their total allowances amount to Rs. 1,60,520, per annum, allowing twenty-five of these Darogahs to receive 100 Rs. per mensem, fifty to receive 75, a hundred to receive 50, and the remainder or three hundred and thirty-three to receive Rs. 25, a possible increase of expense would be incurred to the extent of about 75,000 Rupees annually. But the increase would not actually or at least not for a long time come up to that maximum and thus a commencement would be made at comparatively but little expense to supply those incentives to good conduct in the Police without which any improvement in the existing system has been found to be utterly unattainable.

7. The Deputy Governor directs me to express his anxious hope that this measure for the improvement of the Mofussil Police, so important to the welfare of the community may receive the favourable consideration of the Supreme Government of India.

8. You are requested to return the original enclosure when no longer required.

From T. R. Davidson, Esq. Officiating Secretary to the Government of India, to F. J. Halliday, Esq. Secretary to Government of Bengal, dated the 31st May, 1843.

1. I have the honour to acknowledge your letter No. 754, dated the 17th Instant, conveying a proposition from the Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal for improving the Police by increasing the salaries of a certain number of Darogahs according to their merits, and in reply to communicate the entire concurrence of the Supreme Government in the measure recommended for adoption and to authorize its immediate introduction in the manner contemplated by the Honourable the Deputy Governor.

2. I am also directed to observe that the Honourable the President in Council, whilst he admits the inadequacy of the existing rate of pay of Darogahs and the necessity for removing as much as possible so evident a cause of corruption amongst this class of Police Officers, by rendering their remuneration equal to their decent support, and by opening to them the reward of good service in advancement or promotion, is very desirous, that the principle of the arrangement should be carried still further, not only in respect to Darogahs, but to other classes of Police Officers, and the Government will be prepared to approve the extension of the measure, if in due time it is found that the arrangement now sanctioned, has tended to raise the character and ensure the usefulness of those whom it is intended to affect.

THE CAZEES—MAHOMEDAN LAW.

The office of chief Cazee, or Mahomedan law officer of the Bengal Presidency, has become vacant by the death of the last incumbent; and it is proposed to reduce the salary from Rs. 650 per mensem to Rs 300. But it strikes us, that the opportunity might be taken to modify the whole of the Mahomedan law officer system, which is one of the many instances of the adherence, by our Government, to forms which are not only without value but actually of a pernicious tendency. That the British nation should continue the criminal administration of the country according to a law, the principles of which are odious to the majority of the inhabitants, and opposed to the enlightened views of modern legislators, is a singular anomaly, the absurdity of upholding which is manifest from the alterations we have, from time to time, made in it, to reconcile it to our notions of propriety. We have deprived the Mahomedan law of some of its most glaring vices, relating to the practice of mutilation, the price of blood, the nature of evidence and so forth, so that, as administered in the Mofussil Courts, Mahomedans would scarcely recognise it as the institution of their prophet. It would, perhaps, be interesting to notice the successive alterations introduced into the administration of the Mahomedan criminal law, from the orders of the Government, dated 9th October, 1791, down to Regulation VI of 1832, by which Hindoos and others are permitted to claim exemption from being tried according to that law, and the Nizamut Adawlut are empowered to dispense, at discretion, with the opinion of their law officer on trial referred to them for final order. We shall content ourselves with remarking, that that regulation is inoperative in the majority of cases, before Sessions Judges, in which Hindoos are concerned, who are too ignorant of the law to claim the privilege accorded to them; so that it may be assumed, that in all cases, with a very few exceptions, the Mahomedan criminal law has full sway. On the other hand, the Nizamut Adawlut rarely consult their Cazee except in trials where the Sessions Judge recommends a capital sentence. Both these circumstances appear to us to indicate the necessity of a new law expressly confining the Mahomedan criminal law in its operation to trials of Mahomedans; while common sense loudly calls for the abolition of every part of the Mahomedan criminal law still in force in the Mofussil Courts.

Should the arguments from reason not be sufficiently convincing, those derived from the expense of supporting the Mahomedan law may have some effect. Foremost stands the Madressa, or Mahomedan College, with its European and native superintendants, teachers, &c. in which a gabble of Mahomedan law and Mahomedan philosophy is taught to the future Moulvees of the Sessions Courts. Then come the salaries of the Moulvees of the 45 districts in this presidency, to which a Sessions Judge is attached, making with the salaries of the Cazees of the Sudder Courts of Calcutta and Allahabad, an annual charge of 65,000 rupees, to which probably should be added at least 15,000 rupees for the cost of maintaining the Madressa.

By abolishing the Mahomedan law system, we rid ourselves at once of the disgrace of maintaining a barbarous law, of the odium of enforcing a hateful law on Hindoos, of the burden which a difference of opinion between the Moulvee and the Sessions Judge involves on the Nizamut Adawlut, as well as of the cost of a barbarous and useless system.

To supply the Mofussil courts with futwas (i. e. opinions) on civil causes between Mahomedans, two Cazees, one with each Sudder Court, at a salary of say 300 rupees each, would be amply sufficient, as not more than a hundred futwas are required in a year throughout this presidency. The cost of this establishment would not amount to a tithe of what is incurred under the present system.

The law officers of the Mofussil Courts act in the two-fold capacity of assessor and expounder of the Mahomedan criminal code. Their removal would throw the Sessions Judges upon that provision of Regulation VI. 1832, which authorises the employment of assessors and juries in criminal trial,—a provision which has been found to be singularly ineffective, as few natives, who are not omedwars care to attend to what does not immediately affect them. It is obviously necessary therefore to introduce the jury system altogether into the Mofussil Courts, in lieu of the mongrel system which has been established. The attendance of the jurors must of course be compulsory in Her Majesty's Courts, and in the district Courts of the Madras presidency. The jurors would have to ascertain the facts, and in this respect supersede the Mahommedan law officer, while the Session Judge would apply to the law; and then instead of the appeal allowed by the regulations to a court, which has not the benefit of viva voce evidence, there would be an application for a new trial, in case of any misdirection to the jury, or an argument on any point of law regarding which the decision of the Bench may be questionable.

Were the abolition of the Mahomedan criminal law, as a part of the institutions of this country, to be determined upon, the Zillah Moulvees might be provided with employment as supernumerary moonsiffs, till they could be absorbed into the permanent establishment of judicial officers of that class.—Hurk. July 10.

TRANSLATION OF PETITION.

It is unnecessary for the oppressed inhabitants of the Rajah's Pergunahs to state in how many different ways previous to the year 1243 they made known their grievances and oppressions to the Governor General of India.

When driven to the last extremity and about to desert our houses and Villages owing to the tyrany under which we laboured the Office of Superintendent of the Family Domains was instituted for the express purpose of giving us our just rights. Now however on account of the expense to the state by an Order dated the 6th of April last, the office is abolished and we are again plunged into the deepest grief and distress. While the Surkar spends crores of Rupees in Courts of Justice for the rest of their subjects what fault can we unfortunates have committed that for a trifling saving of about Rupees 300 per month our interests should be totally neglected.

The duties are now made over to the Zillah Judges and Collectors who having already more work to perform than they can get through are utterly unable to do justice to us.

We beg to remark that in the year 1836 the same experiment was made and for two years while under charge of the Collector of Benares nothing whatever was done and at last in the year 1838 the office was again re-established.

Now that it is again abolished the Rajah has attained the summit of his wishes and we are once more in the power of one who will never rest till he has effected our total ruin.

We therefore pray that the separate office of Superintendent be again established and if the Surkar objects to pay the expense itself we consider that for the following reasons it should justly be borne by the Rajah.

1st. Because by Regulation XV. of 1795 the administration of the Pergunahs was made over to him and the appointment of a Superintendent is in full accordance with that Regulation.

2d. Because the office of Superintendent was established on the Rajah's account for the performance of his Work and for his honour and benefit.

3d. Because since the time of Mr. Duncan owing to repeated exactions the demands from us are almost doubled and trebled.

Should however the Surkar decline paying the expense itself and refuse to adjudge it to be defrayed by the Rajah we the undersigned are ready to undertake the payment ourselves requesting that we may be assessed in our monthly Kists according to our different rates of Malgoozaree.

We therefore humbly pray that this petition be forwarded to the Governor General with the view that Captain Stewart with whose administration of justice we are satisfied be again reinstated in the office of Superintendent.

THE LATE MR. JOHN HENRY MOOR.

The Friends and Acquaintances of the late Mr. John Henry Moor, for many years Head Master of the Singapore Institution Free School, will learn with regret that he died without leaving means to satisfy the claims against his Estate, and that his Widow and a family of eight Children, the eldest of whom is a Girl of fifteen and the youngest an infant of three months old, are thus left in a state of absolute destitution. In a case so peculiarly distressing it is trusted that the Communities of the Straits Settlements where the deceased was so long and so well known, will feel that this Orphan Family have no common claims on their charity and benevolence, which have heretofore never been appealed to in vain.

This Paper is put in circulation by the following Gentlemen who will form a temporary Committee for the collection of the funds subscribed and until the same be placed in the hands of the Trustees appointed by the Subscribers at large for its future disposition and management for the benefit of the family.

GWALIOR.

" On Saturday the 24th instant, the usurper Khasghee sent emissaries and Hoozoorials in the name of the Baee to stir up the minds of the Troops under Colonel Baptiste's command and to signify to them that it was her will and pleasure for them to confine all the Christian Officers in their Camp and expel them from their lines. The seepahees after receiving the order rushed into the houses of the Officers and after belabouring them most unmercifully, dragged them bound with ropes into the Gun-sheds and fastened them to the Guns—they were kept confined and starved, and disgracefully turned out of the lines this morning—they are in the most wretched condition, robbed of all their property, and deprived of their large arrears of pay. Colonel Baptiste and his grandsons are also in the greatest embarrassment and threatened to be most shamefully dealt with. They are at present confined to their quarters without a single guard to protect them and some of their private servants and soldiers are also disgraced and confined. Khasghee in expelling the Christians from the Raj rejoices in having revenged himself on the British Government, and has invited all the Pindara Chiefs and bestowed on them honorary dresses with instructions to pillage the neighbouring countries subordinate to the British Government and to keep a strong party on the banks of the Chumbul to oppose the advance of the British Troops on this side the Chumbul. Colonel Jacobs and his Christian Officers are also in dread from what they have witnessed of Baptiste's Camp. As Khasghee is determined to expel all the Christians from the Raj—the bastard Secunder is rejoicing in the downfall of Baptiste. Upwards of 200 Christians of all classes and denominations have been thrown out of berths, and it is hard to say where and how these unfortunate creatures are to obtain a livelihood in the British Territories—they certainly deserve the notice and sympathy of the British Government. These men would form a most useful band of Police Officers, if the British Government would employ them as such under able Superintendents in the district of Bundelcund, &c.—Agra Ukhbar, July 1.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DUELLING.—The Association at present consists of 326 members, including twenty-one noblemen, thirteen sons of noblemen, fourteen members of the House of Commons, fifteen baronets, thirty admirals and generals, forty-four captains R. N., twenty-three colonels and lieutenant-colonels, seventeen majors, twenty-six captains in the army, twenty lieutenants R. N., twenty-four barristers.

It may be added that one of the Secretaries is Captain Henry Hope, R. N., C. B., an officer of high character in the navy, and who obtained the rare distinction of a medal for his brilliant conduct on the occasion when he captured the celebrated American frigate, the President.

Several private Meetings of noblemen, officers, and private gentlemen, were held in the year 1841, which led to a general private Meeting being held at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street, on the 12th of February, 1842, when an Association was formed, and the following Resolutions (omitting matters of formal regulation) were adopted:—

"I. That the following be the basis of this Association, viz.: The members of this Association, under the fullest conviction that the practice of duelling is both sinful and irrational, and alike contrary to the laws of God and man, desire in dependance on the Divine blessing, to discountenance by their influence and example, and by such other means as may appear advisable, the continuance of a practice so dishonouring to God, so fraught with evil to mankind, and so wholly incompatible with the enlightened and responsible state of a nation professing Christianity.

"II. That in order to promote the objects of the Association, the following gentlemen do form a Committee, with power to add to their number, viz. (Here follow the names of the Committee, to which other names have since been added.)

"III. That the following be the instructions to the Committee, viz.:—

"1. That with a view to influence public opinion they shall endeavour to obtain pointed and approved essays on the subject of duelling, for circulation, and to prepare articles in a brief form for occasional insertion in the various periodicals, particularly in those connected with the naval and military professions.

"2. That a well-digested and brief Circular, setting forth the objects of the Association, be prepared for distribution at the discretion of the Committee.

"3. That as it is the intention of this Association to proceed in a quiet and unostentatious way towards the accomplishment of its object, the Committee are not to take any steps of a more public character without the previous sanction of a General Meeting of members. With this qualification they are left to the exercise of their best discretion; and they are to consider themselves intrusted with the admission of members, and to be at liberty to convene a Meeting of the Association whenever it is deemed necessary, or at the written request of any ten of the members."

Enough, it is hoped, has been said to induce a large number of persons to come forward and give their influence in aid of the effort now made to put an end to the practice, against which the preceding observations are directed—or failing that result, to clear themselves from all responsibility on account of its continuance.

Noblemen, officers, and other gentlemen, desirous of becoming members of the Association, or desirous of obtaining further information respecting it, are requested to communicate their wishes to the Honorary Secretaries, Brunswick House, Hanover-square.

THE COMET.—March 20, 27.—The communications were from M. Arago, and related to the comet. Unfortunately, the atmosphere at Paris, he stated, had been so clouded, that what was known relating to the comet came from other places. The intelligence from England was unimportant. It had been seen at Nice, on March 12, 13, and 14; at Toulouse, on the 18th; at Marseilles at the same time as at Paris, and the united observations of the two places would be sufficient to determine its orbit. At Geneva, the weather had enabled very excellent observations to be made, the comet having been examined on three successive occasions. It appeared certain, from the information derived from this quarter, that not only had the present comet approached the nearest the sun of all others known, but that it had even penetrated into the luminous matter of that body. The tail was presented in an oblique direction, and could not be less than 63 millions of leagues. He had taken some observations, with a view of deciding the disputed point as to whether comets shine by their own light, or by a light reflected by the sun, and he was decidedly of opinion that they shine by a light of their own. The appearance of the comet, at this particular moment, would, he said, have the effect of strengthening the old belief, that such phenomena are always productive of dreadful calamities to man. Thus, that which was seen at Rome, in the year 373 before Christ, coincided with an earthquake and inundations, which overturned two cities in the Peloponnesus. The terrible disaster at Guadaloupe would be quoted by many as the dire effects of the present heavenly visitant. It was also generally believed that comets produced an extraordinary elevation in the temperature, and, this year, the weather had certainly been particularly mild; but, remarked M. Arago, this could only be a coincidence, for it was impossible that the immense heat of comets—and Cassini calculated the heat of that seen in 1702 as 2,000 times greater than red-hot iron—could have any effect on our temperature; and calculations made at the Board of Longitude had even proved that the heat in the years when comets appeared have not been, on an average, greater than others, and sometimes was even less.—Athenæum.

THE AERONAUT STEAM-ENGINE.—"How to make a man to fly" is one of the Century of Inventions of that arch-anticipator of all modern inventions, the Marquis of Worcester,—"which I have tried," says he, with characteristic naïveté "with a little boy of ten years old, in a barn;" an excellent caution and laudable foresight; and then he adds this important element in the experiment—"on an hay mow." So completely does this philosophical mode of proceeding square with our own notions of experimental aëronautics, that we confess we experienced no slight disappointment when the many illustrated newspapers of the day brought forth the plans of this much-talked-of Aërial Locomotive Engine, to find that among the various precautions for the safety of passengers, there was no vestige of, nor substitute for, the hay mow of the Marquis of Worcester. We hope this appendage will not be forgotten in the specification.

We entreat our readers not to assume from this rather suspicious commencement of our notice, that we have any intention of treating this subject with either levity or ridicule. The air is a highway that interferes with no vested rights, injures no man's park or pleasure ground, and costs nothing for maintenance. We have neither milestones nor turnpikes there; and, free as air, we may roam where we please, unassailed by taxes or tolls. Railways have realized the fable of Jack the Giant-Killer's "seven-leagued boots;" may the "Ariel" soon realize to the public the fable of the "wishing-cap," and with the purse of Fortunatus reward the inventor; and "may we be there to see,"—for we wish all success to the invention and the inventor; and far be it from us to follow the example of those who ridicule what they cannot understand, and condemn what they are unable to appreciate. So much for feelings and intentions,—now for the facts.

Mr. William Samuel Henson is the inventor of the Aërial Locomotive Steam-Engine, for which patents have been taken out, and a bill has been brought into parliament, to authorize the transfer of the patents to more than twelve persons, who are to be incorporated as the Aërial Transit Company.

Now, the first question one asks about this machine is, how is it to be supported in the air? We know how a balloon ascends, because it is filled with gas, vapour, or smoke lighter than air, and, of course, like smoke, it ascends, and floats in virtue of its small specific gravity. That a balloon should rise in the air, and that it should be rowed forward or propelled by oars or other devices as a boat is rowed by the watermen, or a steam-boat propelled by the paddles, it is easy enough to understand, provided we get a balloon large enough, a man strong enough, or a steam-engine and fuel light enough to be carried up. This balloon plan of aërial locomotion has often been proposed but never effected. It has an obvious disadvantage; the balloon must be of so monstrous a size to carry the necessary weight, that any degree of success in propelling so great a bulk at a tolerable speed through the air becomes hopeless.

The present plan rests on a totally different principle. It is not sustained in the air by buoyancy, but must be kept up by the continued expenditure of power: to render this as easy as possible, means are adopted to retard the descent by gravity. All our readers are acquainted with the construction of the parachute of a balloon—it is an enormous umbrella, by which a person may descend in tolerable safety from a balloon, in case of danger; the size of the umbrella pressing on the air retards the descent of the weight:—now, this is what Mr. Henson uses. He employs an enormous flat umbrella, or gigantic fan or pair of wings (only they do not move as wings do), to keep the weight from falling rapidly; and so, when his machine is once in the air, it will descend but slowly, and the more slowly as the umbrella is larger—the shape is not, however, round like an umbrella, but flat, and oblong, and horizontal.

We may observe at this point, that the size of this umbrella can only retard the descent of the machine, but cannot sustain it. This consideration appears to have altogether escaped our inventors. They say,—"Our umbrella is so large as to expose a foot and a half of surface for every pound of total weight, and therefore, as we have 4,500 square feet of surface, and 3,000lb. of load to carry, we may safely trust that we can stay aloft." But they surely know that no size of umbrella can do more than retard their fall. By a very simple calculation, based on abundant experiment we have found that this aërial machine, supposing all their sanguine plans to be realized, must infallibly fall perpendicularly downwards to the earth, somewhere about the rate of thirteen miles an hour, or eighteen feet per second. So much for the powers of the umbrella!

But may not the power of the steam-engine be applied to keep the machine up in the air, and so countervail this inconvenient gravitation? Let us see. A weight of 3000lb. is descending 18 feet per second—required, the power of steam capable of sustaining it? The answer is 60 horses' power. Our aërial company propose only 20 horses' power for both propelling and resisting powers; and on this slender basis rests the Aërial Transit Company! Sic transit gloria, &c.

Thus have we have lost faith in our aërial friends. We wished to find their plan true and promising—but when we find they have not made such very simple calculations, which a slight knowledge of the element they deal in, and the powers they use, would have suggested, what can we think? what can we hope? We see a want of foresight in their calculation; and in their mechanical devices we do not find those judicious mechanical contrivances, which should favour the hope that the patented ideas of Mr. Henson are in hands likely to bring what merit may lie in them out into practical use.

But, do we mean to say, there is no merit in the invention? On the contrary—it has just merit enough to seduce and fascinate the race of schemers and speculators. It has a good idea in it, and indeed more than one, only it does not seem to be in hands capable of developing what good is in the ideas, in such wise as to bring a practically good thing out of the idea of it.

Further—we have seen that there are no means of sustaining the weight of the engine, even were it once at the necessary elevation. Then how is it ever to get there? The plan is this. The machine is to run down an inclined plane, to acquire a certain velocity, and then spreading its wings, is, by the mere velocity acquired, to rise in the air to the necessary height. Now surely these inventors ought to know that all the velocity a body will ever acquire by running down an inclined plane, will never do more than carry it up as high (barring a little loss) as the top of the plane. We are, therefore, disposed to recommend a start from the top of the inclined plane, rather than the bottom.

But who will set bounds to human ingenuity? We may yet fly. Watt was ridiculed, Galileo persecuted, and Dr. Lardner and the Edinburgh Review cavilled about the transatlantic steam-boats. So doubtless Mr. W. S. Henson, and his friends, think that, as a matter of course, they are martyrs, and we persecutors of unappreciated merit. But we abide by our opinion, and are satisfied with its risks. We may fly by and bye—but this is not the machine. We hoped great things and we are disappointed—

RAILWAYS.—Eighteen months ago we directed attention to some questions regarding the General Economy of the Railroad System, which at that time appeared to us of considerable importance to our national and commercial welfare. The evils to which our attention was directed were then just beginning to be felt as casual annoyances, without having assumed a definite shape or general features. It was occasionally found out that a town which wanted a railway was not large enough to have one. It was ascertained that a particular district was not sufficiently populous to participate in the railway privileges of its neighbours, and, therefore, must be content to remain isolated, cut off from the great railway world, in which alone commerce breathes the atmosphere of health, and grows in the sinews and thews of the mercantile contest. Even a whole fertile and populous country of the British Union, a land teeming with population, and rich in all mercantile, agricultural, and commercial capabilities, is declared to be too poor to share the blessings of the railway system. These evils were then regarded as the inevitable judgments of fate, to be quietly endured with Mahomedan resignation. To us, however, they appeared only as manifestations of the giant evil of the British railway system,—an evil of which we endeavoured to ascertain some of the causes, and to point out what appeared to be the possible remedy. (See Athen. No. 739).

This giant evil in railway economies has recently manifested itself in a variety of ways too palpable to be mistaken; and our observations, which to some at that time appeared too strongly expressed, because, we admit, strongly felt, and were reckoned somewhat premature and overstated, have been forced home on the convictions even of the sceptical and incredulous men of 1841. This evil is the enormous cost of railways. Here, at last, is the bill, as made up by Mr. Wishaw:—

This is truly an appalling array of figures—FORTY MILLIONS sterling and more, expended on 1,500 miles of railway! And worse still, more than half that sum unprofitably invested! Is it not well we should avail ourselves of the present pause of speculation, to ponder on the effect and tendency of so large an investment? Surely this giant feature in modern national economy demands an attention which it can hardly be said to have received.

We shall not, for the present, stop to inquire where this money came from, though this is a most interesting question; nor to find out where this money has gone to, or what has become of it now. Who have gained by the change? who have lost by it? What might have happened if railways had not been created? What a volume might be written on the Railway System as an Element of Social Economy—a source of the wealth of nations! an engine of national industry! commerce! prosperity! luxury! Why has this book not already been written? Who will take up the gage we have thrown before them?

Our question at this moment is, however, a much plainer, homelier, simpler one. Have we been spending all this money in the best way? Have we got the greatest practicable amount of value for our money? Could not the same amount of money have extended the benefits of the system through a wider range? In that case, would not a larger population, enjoying these benefits, have increased the profitableness of investment in all? and would not the number of unprofitable investments have been greatly diminished? Have they already cost so much, that we cannot afford to go any further? Forty millions of pounds—could it have been expended better? Fifteen hundred miles of railway—could we not have had more? Twenty-six thousand pounds a mile—would not less have done equally well? Such are the questions we now put. They should have been put by our legislators long ago, but the ins and outs of office are too important in their eyes to leave leisure for the mere interests of the nation. We may now reply to them more at large, than we did formerly, when we mooted the questions.

Question 1.—1,500 miles of railway for forty millions, at 26,000*l.* per mile! Could this have been less?

350 miles of railway for five millions, at 14,000*l.* per mile.

This is a pretty good reduction to begin with—nearly a half; so that we might, with our much cheaper iron and machinery, have had a double profit on our railway stock, provided always it had been possible to make our railways at the rate of the Belgian—nous verrons.

Answer second:—We have lent a great deal of money to Brother Jonathan: he has made railroads with a portion of it. How has he expended our money comparatively with our own investment? By a careful examination, we have found that Brother Jonathan has made with our capital lent to him:—

6,000 miles of railway for twenty-seven millions, at 4.500*l.* per mile.

In regard to many of these American lines, it is further to be observed, that they are arranged systematically under the direction and superintendence of the government, each State having a main line, supported and enriched by lateral and tributary branches, while the systems themselves are again united on a more extensive scale in larger systems and lines of general communication; thus economizing the resources and extending the advantages of the system, and preventing that redundancy of lines, which in this country deprives some districts altogether of communication, and allows excessive competition on others, injurious to both and to the public well-being. Now, America is a very thinly peopled country; a comparatively poor country; and its distances enormous. Yet, in 1839, all the railways—good, bad, and indifferent—had paid on the average 5½ per cent.!

Let us examine into the causes that have led to the enormous cost of our lines compared with those of other countries; this will go farther to answer our question.

Answer third:—Want of faith in the powers of the locomotive engine and the resources of mechanical improvers, has been one material source of expense.

The slowness to believe in the capabilities of the locomotive engine, exhibited by the engineers of Great Britain, is truly surprising. This is the more suprising, as means for making the experiment have never been wanting, since the earliest coal railways, with the rudest locomotives, were at work at Newcastle, in Scotland, and in Wales. What is most remarkable in the locomotive engine, is its astonishing power of adapting itself to circumstances! of varying its exertions according to the work to be done! of straining every nerve (bolt?) to encounter and conquer a difficulty! of its power of extraordinary exertion in an emergency! It is difficult at first thought for any one to conceive this versatility of energy, especially one who has never handled the wonderful creature. It is well known to the intelligent driver; and, indeed, much of the success of the engine in an effort and in general work depends on the handling and the management,—the "feeding," the "watering,"—now keeping her by the head, now letting her out, now spurring, and occasionally running to her utmost, taking care above all, as with a good steed, never to run her out of breath, to keep her well in check at the starting, never to let her take too much water at a time, and a sufficient interval between her feeds, and especially never to overfeed before hard work. In short, the waggoner must thoroughly understand the character of his individual engine, and the nature of the line and the work, to do his engine any justice; and an unskilful driver will cost his employers more in one day, than his wages will cover in a year; hence he should be well kept, well paid, and moderately worked. But with such a driver, it is wonderful what an engine will accomplish. First, as regards speed, the locomotive engine has a power of adaptation. Let us conceive an engine starting, with a train behind her and going along steadily at fifteen miles an hour,—a slow pace; it will require all the steam she then produces to maintain that pace, and she will manifest no capability of going faster; in short, she will consume all the steam she has the power of producing at that pace, and, therefore, to all appearance and to all reason, she has attained her maximum speed, and can go no faster; nor would an ignorant engineer ever imagine it possible she could do more. But now comes the art and its effect. The driver prepares his steed for the race: he gets the fire into a general glow, except just round the margin, where he lays the fresh coke; he regulates the water until just the proper quantity, but rather full charge, is in the gauge, and waits till the steam is just strong enough to raise the valve. Now for the race: he slacks the rein (valve) a little, and off bounds the steed with increasing strength and speed, and, of course, with a much more rapid expenditure of steam, so that the supply of the boiler would manifestly be soon completely exhausted, and the store being expended, the speed would soon relax; but this does not happen; on the contrary, the steam increases in supply more rapidly, or at least as rapidly as it is carried off, so that instead of the boiler being emptied by the rapid process of exhaustion, it is just the reverse,—that is, the more rapidly it is emptied, the fuller does it become; the more it has to do, the more it is able to do; the greater its speed, the greater its ability to sustain that speed. The paradox is explained thus: and this is one of the wonderful qualities and contrivances of the structure of the locomotive engine, from which it derives its great value as a worker of railway labour, that its powers of exertion and production are developed in precise proportion to the demand for exertion. The contrivance for this purpose is like most valuable inventions, simple in proportion to its value. There is a contrivance for blowing the fire. This contrivance is automatic,—that is, the engine blows the fire of itself. Let us call this apparatus the blast. This blast operates by puffs; and these puffs are so regulated, that when the machine is in motion, the air shall be blown into the fire by one puff for every four feet of distance over which the engine travels. When the engine, therefore, travels over one mile, the fire receives 1,320 puffs. Now each puff carries into the fire a certain quantity of oxygen to sustain the combustion, and this supply of oxygen is a proximate cause of the production of heat by the fire, and, indeed, an approximate measure of the quantity of heat produced; double the quantity of air, therefore, properly applied, will give double the quantity of oxygen, and, of course, double the quantity of heat. Therefore, if each puff force into the fire a given quantity of air with its oxygen, a double number of puffs per minute will give a double supply of heat, and will generate double the quantity of steam, and give out in a minute double the quantity of work. Suppose, now, that an engine starts with a speed of one mile an hour, it will make only about one puff of air into the furnace in three seconds of time; at three miles an hour it will make a puff every second of time, or rather 66 puffs per minute, and will advance about 4½ feet per second; at twelve miles an hour it will advance 18 feet per second, and make 264 puffs per minute; and at twenty-four miles an hour, it will make a bound forward of 12 yards in every second of time, but in each second of time it will also make 9 puffs, or 528 puffs per minute. By this contrivance of making the puffs of the blast apparatus regulated not by an independent cause, but directly by the speed of the engine, or the quantity of steam it requires, which is as the speed, there is given to the locomotive that faculty, by which its means of generating strength increases along with the demand for that strength. It was otherwise in the early locomotive engines; they were, in this respect, like the common engines of a steam-boat, or like the common steam-engines fixed on land; these engines have a chimney, the height of which measures the draught, and it has no connexion whatever with the number of strokes of work that may be required of the engine. They will only burn a given amount of fuel, and raise a given quantity of steam, and do a given quantity of work per day, whatever be the accidental necessities of the case. But for this beautiful contrivance, the locomotive engine would have been an inert, plodding machine, like any commonplace engine. It is this wonderful ability to increase and multiply its powers of performance with the emergency that demands them, which has made the giant engine the noblest creation of human wit, the very lion among machines. With this wonderful capacity, it may be truly said, that danger and expense are the only known limits of railway speed.

We have said that want of faith in the capabilities of the locomotive engine has formed one important item in the expense of the English railway system. Engineers set out in their railway career with the impression that the locomotive was ill-calculated to climb up hill with its load, and that, therefore, to work with advantage, it must work on lines either altogether level or nearly so; hence mountains required to be levelled, valleys filled up, tunnels pierced through rocks, and viaducts reared in the air—gigantic works at a gigantic cost, all for the purpose of enabling the engine to travel along a dead level, or nearly so. But here, again, was want of faith in the powers of the locomotive engine. The locomotive engine can climb the mountain side, as well as career along the plain; for here, also, its wonderful quality of increasing its efforts with the emergency comes into play. We have already seen how, in running along the level, the engine's powers of production increase with the demand for them, and supply of steam increases in proportion to the speed of the engine; but so also does the power of propulsion increase with the load to be dragged, or with the steepness of the incline to be ascended. In proportion as the load is increased does the elasticity of the steam, as it issues from the engine, increase, and thereby is the strength of the blast which blows the fire so increased, as to generate more steam, and stronger in proportion to the severity of the work to be done. Thus the locomotive engine has been found capable of ascending hills of rapid inclination. A slope rising 1 yard in 220, or 8 yards in a mile has been found hardly of sensible disadvantage in a railway; double that, or 48 or 50 feet in a mile, is quite practicable; and the parliamentary slope of a common road, or 1 foot in 36, by no means impossible to the wonderful powers of our present improved locomotive engines. It should, therefore, cease to be deemed impossible to adapt railroads to the face of the country. Those enormous works may be dispensed with, or greatly diminished, which were made for the purpose of making the way practicable to the locomo*tive engine*; and the enormous expense which this erroneous view, this want of faith, has cost us in the past, may be saved us in the future. Engineers must resign their crotchets about optimum gradients,—must cut their roads, as their tailors their coats, according to their cloth, and give to such places as will not pay for an optimum railway such a railway as their means can afford or their traffic warrant. Instead of going through the mountain, they must go over it, or round its base, as they best can. We can no longer afford to erect costly monuments of the talent or ambition of engineers; we want plain, useful, profitable railroads for the carriers of our goods and the drivers of our coaches; we want a fair speed and a moderate price, and that is all we wanted, or should have had, from the beginning; by which means we might now have had double the length of line, and a much larger revenue for the present amount of national expenditure.

So much for gradients: but there is another crotchet of engineers about curves, which, equally absurdly and uselessly, has cost immense sums of money. Neither satisfied to go over a hill or round it, our engineers insist on going through it: like the land-crab in its migrations, the engineer in his railways, seems to forget that he has the power of turning to the right or left, and insists, at all hazards, of going right on, and eating his way through when necessary; he flatters himself that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points and has an instinct, like the ass, which directs him to adopt it. (We forget which ancient philosopher asserts, that the donkey has an intuitive knowledge of geometry, as far as the XVII. Prob. of Euclid, for, says he, place a donkey at one end of a straight line and a bundle of hay at the other, and he will manifest his proficiency by adopting the straight line, rather than any other line, to reach the fodder). When a hill is in his way, the engineer says, remove that hill, and take this rock and fill with it that chasm,—forgetting how much easier (commercially speaking) it may be to remove that locomotive engine out of the way of the mountain, than the mountain out of the way of the locomotive engine. A very learned and profoundly scientific engineer will tell you, that the straight line is the only true path of momentum for moving bodies, or rather the circle of curvature of the earth, and will, to prove his learning, refer you to the Phil. Nat. Principia Math., auct. Isaaco Newtono, Eq. Aurato, p. 15, edit. P. P. Thomæ le Seur et Francisci Jaquier, vol. primum; and there to the Leges Motûs, ubi lex primum: Corpus omne perseverare in statu suo quiescendi vel movendi uniformiter in directum, nisi quâtenus viribus impressis cogitur statum illum mutare: which he interprets thus, that a locomotive engine naturally prefers (like the philosopher's ass aforesaid) the straight line, and is, indeed, so fond of it, that you have only to give it a push at one end of it, and it will arrive, without further impulse, at the other, under the guidance of Newton's first law of motion. Now all this is very profound and very wise, only it happens not to be true so far as the locomotive engine is concerned. The locomotive engine does not like the straight line, and never will go in it. When placed on a straight and level piece of railway, it will, of its own accord, begin pirouetting from one side to the other, describing a continual serpentine line, as far as the rails and the guiding flanges of its own wheels will let it. This oscillating motion may often be felt even in the carriages, when going fast. The opposite axiom is, therefore, true, and is this, that locomotive engines prefer curves to straight lines, and always will adopt them when not prevented; so that, in short, it is always proper and right to use curves when wanted, provided their curvature do not exceed the curvature which the engine would naturally take when moving with a given velocity. Experience has shown, that such curves are perfectly consistent with speed, regularity, and safety. Had engineers been sufficiently acquainted with their profession, they would have understood all this, and spared us many millions of expenditure, besides leaving us a great deal of money to have been making railroads with now, instead of having none. Much that has been said, and unhappily done, in the English railway system, has gone on these two grand errors, arising from ignorance of the nature of the locomotive engine, and want of faith in its capabilities, and the gradual improvement that would take place in its manufacture. It can both climb a hill and go round one with ease and safety, and fair speed. To select a level and straight line is very proper and right, if it is to be had, and the wish for one is very well, if, by so doing, the engineer can make the mountain (and why not the valley as well?) come to him. Let the engineer select the shortest and straightest and levellest line he can get, by all means; but if Nature has been very perverse let him work with her, rather than without her. If, by making a line two miles in fifty longer, he can make it two thousand in ten thousand cheaper, which he frequently could, it is not difficult to see which way the gain lies.

Now, be it observed, that we are talking all this while, not of what engineers might have done by possibility, if they had been of our mind, but of what they actually have done, against their will, when they have been compelled by circumstances to give proofs opposed to their own practices. Mr. —— finds that his tunnel through a hill will not stand (on account of the nature of the soil), and, in order to open his railway at all, is compelled to go round the hill instead of through it, which might have been done with easier curves, and better, if he had voluntarily done so at first, to avoid not so much the mountain of earth as the mountain of money in his way. No, but the reputation of the engineer rises with a handsome tunnel, and falls with a sharp curve. There's the rub. The engineer loves a bit of good masonry, a well formed arch and a good tunnel; therefore it must be made, and of course the company will pay: but this may be thought personal, so we will stop. We have merely shown, that where impossibilities have rendered curves imperative, they are adopted without hesitation: now economical views—the interests of the country at large—should have rendered them imperative, and we should have had more railways and better returns for them. And as with curves, so with inclinations. Where it has proved impossible, from the features of the country, to get level lines with inclinations formerly considered impracticable are successfully employed. When it is known that the cost of cutting down hills and of filling up hollows increases in the two-fold proportion of the height and depth, it will be seen how enormously the expense increases with the theoretical perfection of the line; thus, a cutting of four miles in length, and of an average seventy feet deep, will cost, say 60,000*l*. per mile; now, by a gentle increase of inclination towards the summit level, before entering and after emerging from it, one-half of the depth may be saved; but while one-half of the depth is saved, three-fourths of the expense are saved, or the cutting is reduced to 15,000*l*. per mile, being a clear saving of 45,000*l*. per mile, or of 180,000*l*.: a bagatelle, it may be said, in three or four millions; true, but many such bagatelles would sensibly affect these same millions, and would, moreover, suffice to open many a good paying branch line for the public use, so extending the benefits of the system, besides providing many a good feeder to the line itself. The same law holds in regard to embankments as well as cuttings, whose expense diminishes in a double proportion to the diminution of height, besides manifold subsequent advantages in sustentation and repairs, and condition of way.

If engineers must have monuments of their talent, we suggest that St. James's Park, at the end of George Street, Westminster, would be a much more appropriate site for them than the lines of railway over which passengers pass so often without seeing the engineering wonders of the line, often in the darkness of night, and still oftener in the dark about the merits of the railways and those who made them. But on this site in the Park, at the end of Engineer-street, might all these monuments be accumulated in one vast pile, erected at the public expense:—or rather say, that all the money which might be, or might have been saved by intelligent engineering, were devoted to the erection there of a tower or pyramid of granite, we are sure the tower would be higher than that of Belos, and the pyramid than that of Cheops. On it might be exhibited to advantage the names of talented engineers, whose united labours would, we are confident, far outstrip, if thus accumulated, even on railways alone, all the labour, material, and cost of all the pyramids of all the Pharaohs. In this building might be held all the meetings of the great Institution of Engineering: here might be exhibited all the works of those great men whose title in future to admission should be as follows: that they should exhibit the plans, not as heretofore, of the monuments of Genius they have actually built, at public expense, but of all which they would have built, had not an enlightened regard to the general welfare led them to prefer the public good to their personal gratification. And thus at last might these exhibitions display, in happy and harmonious union, Genius, Principle, and disinterested Patriotism. But we are speaking of Utopia: engineers will have monuments as long as the public will submit to pay.

Examples are not wanting, in our own country, of the successful adoption of the economical principles of construction we have ventured to recommend and to advocate. The great line between Liverpool, Manchester, and London illustrates our principle well: the northern half, below Birmingham, called the Grand Junction, cost 23,000*l*. per mile; the upper half, between Birmingham and London, cost 50,000*l*. per mile. Now in this great disparity, one very important element is this, that the former adapts itself to the face of the country, rising and falling as much as 20, 30, and 60 feet per mile, while the latter rigidly limits itself to the theoretical gradient, excluding in every case a steeper inclination than 16 feet per mile: witness the result; the one of 82 miles length is made under two millions of expense; the other, of 112 miles, has cost more than five and a half millions. The consequences are as follows: the one pays a considerably larger per-centage of profit, though with much less traffic than the other, and we do not find in the comparative expenses of working the lines anything from which we can infer that any practical advantage is gained on the more expensive line, either in more economical, more expeditious, more safe, or more regular transport. Cui bono? is the question which the disparity of expense brings home upon us continually—echo answers Cui bono?

Again, take the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, 62 miles long. It passes through a most difficult country, and might have been an expensive railway in the hands of a talented and ambitious engineer; but being in prudent and conscientious management it has cost less than a million, or about 15,000*l*. per mile. Curves and inclinations suitable to the country are adopted: Mr. Wishaw, in his 'Railways,' says very justly—"Whoever is in the habit of travelling on this railway between Newcastle and Carlisle, will be forcibly struck with the sinuosities of its course throughout; yet notwithstanding this apparent impediment to speedy locomotion, no railway in the kingdom is better regulated in point of punctuality of the arrivals, especially of the quick trains, nor is there any upon which fewer accidents have occurred."

But the most extraordinary line is the Birmingham and Gloucester, where we find two planes, rising 52 feet in a mile, one of 65 feet, and one which rises the unparalleled amount of nearly 140 feet per mile, or one foot high in every 37 feet forward, being about the inclination of a slope in a good mail-coach road. We do not, however, quote this as a desirable rate of railway inclination: we merely adduce it as a practicable inclination, which it would be better to put up with than want a line, or want profit on the line when made.—Athenæum.

FRENCH COMMERCE.—The Moniteur publishes the returns of the imports of merchandise into France during the month of March last, the duties on which produced 12,157,372*f*. The principal articles were colonial sugar, 53,349 metrical quintals; foreign sugar, 9,337; coffee, 24,937; cotton, 94,327; hempen and flaxen threads, 8,780; linen, 3,681; wool, 9,139; silk, 1,511; copper, 9,555; cast iron, 39,354; coal, 1,403,023; lead, 11,539; zinc, 10,952; olive oil, 42,120; &c. As respects the linens imported, there was a falling off compared with the corresponding month of 1841 and 1842 of fully one half; that of the hempen and flaxen threads was 6,704 metrical quintals less than in March, 1841, and 4,852 less than in 1842. The quantity of colonial sugars lying in the Government bonding stores at the close of March last was 234,962 metrical quintals; that of foreign sugars, 81,124. The duties levied on those imports during the first quarter of 1843 amounted to 35,251,140*f*., exceeding by 8,435,887*f*. those of 1841, and by 2,934,017 those of 1842.—Record.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

Allahabad, 26th June, 1843.

The following extract of a letter from His Excellency the Governor of Scinde, together with the report of Lieutenant Anderson, are published for general information.

By order of the Right Honourable the Governor General of India,

J. THOMASON, Secy. to Govt. of India, with the Governor General.

Extract from a letter from His Excellency Major General Sir C. J. Napier, K. C. B., Governor of Scinde, dated Hydrabad, 30th May, 1843.

"As Shere Mahomed found that he could not recruit his troops in Scinde, he resolved to draw reinforcements from the mountains of Belochistan; I therefore sent Lieutenant Anderson of the 1st European Regiment, with a Steamer and 100 men, to destroy the boats collected on the right bank for the Belooches of Sukkur to cross over to Scinde. This Officer has performed his duty in a brilliant manner: and he speaks highly of the way in which Master Miller of the Steamer manœuvred his vessel. The rumour of this skirmish in Belochistan will have good effect in Scinde."

Above the Luckie Pass, 27th May, 1843.

SIR,

I had the honour to inform His Ex. Sir C. Napier, K. C. B., Governor of Scinde, this morning, that I had expectations of finding some 500 Belooches of Meer Shah Mahomed assembled below the Luckie pass, to give us fight on our arrival there.

When we came in shore opposite Rock A. the Belooches fired into the Steamer, and to judge from their fire, they must have been 300 or 350 strong. The Steamer immediately returned their fire doing some execution. We then ran down to B. and landed the Sepoys of the 25th Regt. strength as per margin, who chased the enemy out of their position N. O P. A., and drove them up the steeps beyond. It being useless to pursue them any further, the Sepoys returned leisurely on board, after having killed and wounded about 10 of them. During the skirmish the Steamer kept up a splendid fire of grape and round shot at the retreating Belooches, killing and wounding it is supposed 40 men.

1 Soobedar.
5 Havildars.
5 Jemadars.
91 Sepoys.

Mr. Lowry received a slight wound leading on his men, and 2 Sepoys were killed and 7 wounded carrying the heights.

On board the Steamer Captain Miller received a slight wound, and two European sailors and 1 Stoker were severely wounded.

I must beg to express my thanks to all parties for their activity during the affair, which lasted altogether 3 hours, from 1 to 4 P. M. of this day.

Accompanying is a list of killed and wounded for the information of His Excellency.

(Signed) N. A. ANDERSON, Lieutenant, In charge of Expedition.

GENERAL ORDERS—QUEEN'S TROOPS.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 17th June, 1843.

No. 37.—1. At a General Court Martial assembled at Umballa, on Monday, the 5th day of June 1843, Captain George Dobson Young, of Her Majesty's 31st foot, was arraigned on the following charge:

Charge.—For highly unbecoming conduct, on the 18th day of April 1843, at Khytul, in the following instances:

1st.—In having failed to report to the officer commanding in the fort of Khytul, or to the political authority in charge of the same, that he had received information of treasure being concealed in a tykhana, or place under ground, within the fort; and in having, without authority, proceeded thither with several other officers and native servants to search for the treasure and having dug through a wall in prosecution for his search, which led to portions of the treasure being unwarrantably abstracted from the said tykhana.

2d.—In having proceeded into the said tykhana, as above mentioned, notwithstanding that two native sentries were posted there to prevent the ingress of any person.

3d.—In having, though aware that his own servant and other persons possessed portions of the treasure abstracted, made no report to that effect, and taken no means to cause the restoration of the money, till he was informed, that the existence of the treasure had been previously known to the political authority.

Finding.—The Court, having maturely deliberated on the evidence produced before them, are of opinion, that the prisoner, Captain George Dobson Young, Her Majesty's 31st foot, is not guilty of the 1st part of the 1st instance, but guilty of the remaining portion; viz. "and in having, without authority, proceeded thither with several other officers and native servants to search for the treasure, and having dug through a wall in the prosecution of his search, which led to portions of the treasure being unwarrantably abstracted from the said tykhana."

That he is not guilty of the 3d instance of the charge preferred against him.

Sentence.—The Court having found the prisoner, Captain George Dobson Young, Her Majesty's 31st foot, not guilty of the 1st part of 1st instance, not guilty of the 2d instance, not guilty of the 3d instance of the charge, do honourably acquit him of the same; the Court having found the prisoner guilty, of so much of the 1st instance of the charge, beg to express their conviction that he was impelled to the search for treasure, by no dishonourable or unworthy motives, and that his conduct in so doing can only be accounted as amounting to an error in judgment, to which they attach no criminality.

Finding only Approved,
(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General,

16th June, 1843.

Remarks by His Excellency the Commander in-Chief in India.—The Commander-in-Chief cannot concur with the Court in not attaching criminality to that portion of the 1st instance of which they have found Captain Young guilty—were the verdict approved as it now stands, an officer with impunity might search for treasure in a fort under civil charge, two days after its evacuation; might pass by sentries said to be posted to prevent such attempts in the lower orders; and, when the Civil Officer is hastily coming to look after the treasure, he might collect and restore what had been abstracted.

Captain Young gives a motive for his proceedings not exactly in accordance with the Court's opinion, that he merely erred in judgment; he looked for treasure in the hope of obtaining a per centage on what he discovered. His Excellency considers this an excuse unworthy of an old officer—unless he had been encouraged to search with that view, by the Civil Authority, in whose care the fort and all it contained then was, Captain Young, had no right to make such search; and his idea of per centage, already objected to, ought never to have been entertained in a case where prize money could not be claimed.

So much obloquy and misrepresentation attend generally such seizures of money, that the Commander-in-Chief recommends Captain Young, and all other officers to abstain from searching for it without authority; some part of it may adhere certainly to those who find it, but envy, evil report, detraction and censure are sure to follow, and to adhere also.

Captain Young is to be released and to return to his duty.

There were six Subaltern officers on this Court Martial, which is quite at variance with Her Majesty's regulations, and such a proceeding is hereafter to be carefully avoided.

2. At a General Court Martial assembled at Fort William, on Friday, the 2d day of June 1843, Private Anthony Boyle, No. 899, of No. 4 or Captain Stock's Company, Her Majesty's 10th regiment of foot, was arraigned on the following charges:

Charges.—1st.—For having in Fort William, on the 21st day of May 1843, struck Corporal Patrick O'Flaherty, of the same regiment, his superior officer, the Corporal being in the execution of his office.

2d.—For having, about the same time, when a prisoner in the regimental guard room in Fort William, struck Lance Corporal Stephen Cuthberton, his superior officer, the Lance Corporal being in the execution of his office.

3d.—For having, when a prisoner there, on the 22d day of May 1843, used mutinous and threatening language towards Color Sergeant James Camerford, of the same regiment.

Finding.—The Court are of opinion, that the prisoner, Private Anthony Boyle, No. 899, of No. 4 or Captain Stock's Company Her Majesty's 10th regiment of foot, is

On the 1st charge guilty.
On the 2d charge guilty.
On the 3d charge guilty.

Sentence.—The Court having found the prisoner guilty, and taking into consideration his previous convictions, and his general bad character, do sentence him, Private Anthony Boyle No. 899, of No. 4 or Captain Stock's Company, Her Majesty's 10th regiment of foot, to imprisonment, in such place as the officer commanding Her Majesty's 10th regiment shall appoint, for fifteen lunar months, and to be kept in solitary confinement for the sixth, eighth, tenth, and fourteenth months of such imprisonment.

Head Quarters, Simlah, 17th June, 1843.

At a general court martial assembled at Umballa, on Friday the 9th day of June 1843, Nedhan Sing, havildar, of No. 4 company, 26th regiment light infantry, was arraigned on the following charge:—

Charge.—"For gross neglect of duty, on the 18th day of April 1843, when in command of a guard placed at the entrance to a tykhana, or place under ground, in the fort of Khytul, with positive orders to prevent the ingress of any one, failed to report to his superior officer in command of the troops in the fort, that the said tykhana had been entered by officers and persons, both European and Native.

Finding.—"The court, having maturely deliberated on the evidence produced before them, are of opinion, that the prisoner Nedhan Sing, havildar of No. 4 company, 26th regiment light infantry, is guilty of the charge preferred against him.

Sentence.—"The court having found the prisoner guilty of the charge preferred against him, do sentence him, Nedhan Sing, havildar, of No. 4 company, 26th regiment light infantry, to be reduced to the rank and pay of a private sepoy."

Not confirmed,
and Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

REMARKS BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN INDIA.

The Commander-in-Chief would have approved of this sentence, but that there is an entire want of proof as to the orders given to the havildar.

2dly. The evidence of Captain Willies should have been given to the court, and not transcribed (as it was) from the record of another trial.

The remarks made in general orders of the 30th March 1832, upon a similar error escaped attention, possibly the orders were not at hand; but his Excellency is surprised that the inaccuracy, indeed the injustice of such a proceeding, should not have been obvious.

The havildar is to be released, and to return to his regiment.

Before the same court martial assembled at Umballa, on Friday the 9th day of June 1843, Beekarie, sepoy, of No. 3 company, and Hurbunjun Sing, sepoy, of No. 3 company, 26th regiment light infantry, were arraigned on the following charge:—

Charge.—"For gross neglect of duty, on the 18th of April 1843, when on sentry in the fort of Khytul, at the entrance to a tykhana or place under ground, which contained treasure, in the following instances:

"1st. In having in disobedience of positive orders to the contrary, permitted several officers and persons, both European and Native, to enter the said tykhana.

"2d. In having quitted their post, without being regularly relieved."

Finding.—"The court, having maturely deliberated on the evidence before them, are of opinion, that the prisoner Beekarie, sepoy, of No. 3 company, 26th regiment light infantry, is,

"Not guilty of the 1st instance.

"That he is not guilty of the 2d instance of the charge preferred against him.

"That the prisoner Hurbunjun Sing, sepoy, of No. 3 company, 26th regiment light infantry, is Sentence.—"The court, having severally found the prisoners Beekarie, sepoy, of No. 3 company, and Hurbunjun Sing, sepoy, of No. 3 company, 26th regiment light infantry, not guilty of the charge preferred against them, do hereby acquit them of the same."

Confirmed,
(Signed) J. NICOLLS, General,
and Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

REMARKS BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF IN INDIA.

Had these prisoners been convicted, it would have been necessary to release them, in consequence of the proceedings being vitiated (as in the preceding case) by transcribing parts of the evidence recorded on a former trial, instead of examining the witness again in presence of the accused.

By order of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief,
J. R. LUMLEY, Major General,
Adjutant General of the Army.

THE JUNE MAIL arrived on Monday evening in forty-one days from London. It can scarcely be pronounced barren, when it announces events which so deeply affect our own native land, as the secession of four hundred and forty Ministers from the Church of Scotland; the first decisive stand made against the progress of Puseyism; and the alarming progress of Repeal agitation in Ireland. In Scotland the event which has been long anticipated with so much anxiety, has at length occurred. The Ministers who have adhered to the Veto, exceeding four hundred in number, have seceded from the establishment. On the 18th of May, when the General Assembly had been constituted, a protest on their part was read by Dr. Welsh, after which they rose and walked out of the Assembly, which proceeded immediately to rescind their resolutions, and undo all they have been doing for seven years. The seceders proceeded to the Church of St. Andrew, and there constituted themselves the Free Protesting Church of Scotland. They have formed themselves into an organized body, and raised subscriptions for the erection of other churches, and for their own support. The subscriptions amounted according to the last account to 244,000£ and were expected shortly to reach £300,000. A very large portion of their congregations still continue to adhere to them, and though the vacancies which have thus been created will shortly be filled up, and the established Church may appear to have lost none of its integrity, it is evident that it will henceforth be able to reckon but a small minority of the people in its communion. In the present distracted state of England, it is difficult to say what may be the effect of this step on its religious state and prospects; but it is scarcely possible that a measure of such magnitude, grounded as it is on principle, however mistaken, and not on passion, should fail, sooner or later, to exercise a powerful influence on its neighbour.

Dr. Pusey has been suspended from his functions in the University for two years, in consequence of a Sermon preached at Oxford, in which the Roman Catholic doctrines of transubstantiation, and of the sacrifice of the Mass for the remission of sins, were distinctly and unequivocally maintained. A "Board of Heresy" was immediately appointed to examine the sermon, and the result was the suspension of the Doctor, against which he has entered his protest. This decisive step shews that there is still some spirit left in the University; and that its leading authorities are not tinctured with the leaven of Tractarianism, to the extent which some have affirmed. Why do not the Puseyites imitate the noble example set them by the Scottish seceders, and throw up their Protestant livings? Has Dr. Pusey less courage than Dr. Chalmers?

The condition of Ireland is appalling. Mr. O'Connel has for some time past devoted his time and energy to the promotion of Repeal agitation. He has succeeded so completely in inflaming the public mind, that the Ministry have felt it necessary to adopt the most vigorous measures to prevent the threatened dismemberment of the empire. The declaration against Repeal made by King William in 1834, has been repeated by Queen Victoria, through her accredited ministers, and men of all parties, and of every shade of political opinion seem determined to stand by the Union. Of the precise form which the agitation has taken, and which has rendered it an object of ministerial anxiety, the London Mail does not tell us; it only states that large bodies of men, to the number of 150,000 and 500,000 had assembled to hear O'Connell's harangues on Repeal. Sir C. O'Loghlin, and ten other barristers, some of them in extensive practice, have given in their adhesion to the measure. The Roman Catholic Hierarchy, with the exception of three prelates, have thrown their weight into the scale, and there can be little doubt that it is a struggle of the Popish party for the acquisition of political power and of the Cathedrals and revenues of the Protestant establishment.

The Repealers cannot of course long continue quiescent. They must shortly proceed to action, and the first overt act they commit, will bring them within the statute of treason, and render the interference of the public authorities necessary. It is stated that all the forts in Ireland have been surveyed; that a squadron consisting of six vessels has been sent thither, that ten steamers are to be sent to the Coast, and that the army is to be increased to the extent of 10,000 men. Meanwhile all the Justices of the peace, some of them members of Parliament, who had joined the Repeal party, have been turned out. In this emergency it is some consolation to know that the iron Duke is at the head of the army, and that his voice is all powerful in our councils. He will not be backward on so great an occasion. Whatever vigor of resolution, and energy of action can accomplish in putting down this seditious movement, will not be wanting. Still it is fearful to reflect on the horrors which must attend a civil war. Nothing assuredly could justify this resort to arms but the certainty that to grant this unreasonable demand and repeal the Union, would be equally fatal to the honour, the peace and happiness of both countries. Repeal the union! said George Canning; Revive the Heptarchy!

Indian affairs have not occupied much of the attention of the country. or of Parliament. We cannot always expect to have the Gazettes to ourselves. There was in fact no prominent event to fix public attention, beyond the occupation of Scinde, and the valour of the troops under Sir Charles Napier. It does not appear likely from the tenor of the papers before us that any particular notice will be taken of the conquest of Scinde. The Editors of the public journals will soon be reconciled to it, when they come to calculate the advantages of having obtained the province. After paying a few compliments to the virtue of political moderation, and denouncing, as they have done for the last seventy years, all ambitious aggrandisement in India, they will dismiss the subject with a hope that the blessings of our administration will more than cover the iniquity of the acquisition. We think that if any friend of Lord Ellenborough has been supposing that the present mail would bring so severe a remonstrance from his friends in the Ministry, as to induce his Lordship to relinquish the Government, he will find himself mistaken.—The Mail announces that Mr. W. W. Bird's period of service in Council has been extended for another year; and that Mr. Frederick Millett has been nominated provisional Member of Council, both which arrangements will meet with general approbation. It also announces the death of the President of the Board of Control, Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci; and the appointment of the Earl of Ripon, formerly known as Mr. Prosperity Robinson, to succeed him.

The Mail has not a word about the Educational clauses of the Factory Bill, farther than that the Methodist body object as much to the amended, as to the original Bill. We must wait for our regular files for particulars, but there can be little doubt that it has been consigned to the tomb of the Capulets. The only other item of intelligence worthy of particular notice, is the fact that there had been a serious misunderstanding between the Corn law Conservatives and the Ministry, touching the admission of American wheat, when ground in Canada, at a fixed duty of 4 shillings, which is in fact to admit American corn, by a round about journey into England, at a low duty. The Ministry were firm, and offered to go out—and of course to let in the Opposition—if they were not supported. This soon brought the country gentlemen to their senses, which they are not likely to lose again for some time, for Sir Robert Peel can aways work effectually on their fears by alluding to the Whigs, just as the nurse controls a froward child by frightening him with a "bugaboo."

THE GOVERNMENT OF BENGAL.—On Thursday morning, Lord Ellenborough left Barrackpore for Calcutta, where he resumed his seat in Council, re-appointed Mr. Bird whose functions had ceased on his Lordship's return, to the Government of Bengal, and on Friday evening came back to his country seat at Barrackpore.

For those who may happen to be unacquainted with the internal economy of our Government, we would mention that though the 69th Section of the last Charter Act allows the Governor General to appoint a Deputy Governor of Bengal as often as the exigencies of the public service require it, it has been usual for his Lordship when at the Presidency to exercise the office of Governor himself, and that a separate Governor has in no instance been appointed, except when the Governor General has quitted Calcutta for another Presidency. Lord Ellenborough has broken through this rule, separated the administration of Bengal from the office of Governor General, and appointed Mr. Bird to preside over it. We believe it will be generally felt that the present measure is one of the wisest his Lordship has adopted, not merely in reference to the individual on whom his choice has fallen, but to the general interests of the community.

Bengal includes, according to the most authentic accounts, thirty seven millions and a half of people, a larger population than that of France. The revenues of the Presidency are greater than those of Spain and Portugal united. It will be at once perceived that the management of a country so populous and so wealthy, ought to be entrusted to a separate administration, and should not be united with another office, the duties of which are as great as a single individual can get through. But we need not travel to Europe to illustrate the propriety of the present measure. The most satisfactory proof of its wisdom will be found in India itself, by a reference to Madras and Bombay. Madras is said to contain a population of thirteen millions and a half; Bombay, of six millions and a half; in all, twenty millions. The Presidency of the Lower Provinces comprises a population of nearly double that number. The revenues of Bengal, in the four articles of land tax, opium, salt and customs, are fifty per cent more than the united revenues of the two minor—rather sister—Presidencies. Each of those Presidencies however enjoys a separate Governor and a separate Council, exonerated from all political responsibility, with little else to attend to beyond the internal administration of the country. If two Governors and two Councils are found necessary for the administration of those Presidencies, how much more necessary is it for the Presidency of Bengal to possess at least a distinct administration, instead of being mixed up with the general government of the empire, and placed under the immediate control of the Governor General. It is impossible for him to do justice to the general interests of the country, and to the particular interests of this vast province. It is physically impossible for one man to manage the vast relations of an Empire as extensive as that of Rome, and at the same time to find sufficient leisure for the various questions connected with the Civil and Criminal administration, the management of the Land revenue, the Stamps, the Customs, the Post Office, the Abkaree, the internal and external Steam establishment and the Education, of the Province of Bengal.

It was one of the most unwise provisions of the last Charter, which invested the Governor General with larger powers than his predecessors had exercised, and gave him a general control over all the Presidencies, and at the same time encumbered him with the internal management of the largest of its provinces. It was unjust equally to the empire at large and to the Lower provinces in particular to impose such incompatible duties on the same individual. It was ridiculous to call on the Governor General of India, in his capacity of Governor of Bengal, to decide on an estimate for the repairs of a cutchery, or the appointment of a Sudder Ameen, or the supply of a Thannah with the Bengalee Government Gazette, while his attention was required for the more important questions connected with the political relations of the Empire. The framers of that act however inserted a clause by which the Governor General was empowered to correct this anomaly, and to appoint a Deputy Governor of Bengal, when the exigencies of the public service required it, and Lord Ellenborough has had the wisdom and courage to avail himself of the permission. The Hurkaru enquires, where is the exigency? Look around, east, west, north and south, survey the province of Bengal from Buxar to Sandoway and from Sudiya to Chota Nagpore, count its population, and cast up its revenue, and then say whether the diversified, and weighty interests of such a province do not demand a distinct administration. The exigence has always existed; it has often been acknowledged, and it is now made the groundwork of a new and salutary provision. Through this extensive and populous region it is necessary not only to check the growth of abuses, to ensure the punctual and honest discharge of duties; but to provide for a progressive improvement in every branch of the administration; and the social and moral elevation of its inhabitants. Is it possible for the Governor General with his imperial responsibilities to devote that attention to a single province which shall secure these results?

The present measure shews that experience is not lost on Lord Ellenborough. Had Mr. Bird been distracted with other cares while engaged in the Government of Bengal, he would have had little leisure to digest those measures of improvement which have rendered his administration so beneficial. But Lord Ellenborough took charge of the Empire, while he left Bengal to Mr. Bird, and the result has been such as to point out the wisdom of the arrangement and to recommend its being prolonged. Who will venture to say that it would have been wiser in Lord Ellenborough to have consigned Mr. Bird to the comparative inactivity of the Council Chamber, and encumbered himself with all the details of the public administration in this single province? So far therefore from considering the appointment of a separate Governor unnecessary, we are rather inclined to hope that the arrangement will be made perpetual, and that the province will never again be left without a distinct and independent Government.

THE UNION BANK.—The Half yearly meeting of the Union Bank was held on Saturday last, the 15th. Instant. It was a stormy and protracted meeting, and left the main points for which it had been made special, to be discussed on a subsequent day. A statement of the accounts was laid before the Shareholders, from which it appeared that its total assets amounted to Rs. 1,49,77,344; and its liabilities, including the Capital stock, to 1,42,85,542 Rs. leaving an apparent surplus or profit of 6,91,801 Rs., on which it was resolved to declare a dividend of Eight Per Cent.

In the course of the discussions Mr. Clark alluded to the singular circumstance, that while the Bank had been subject to an actual loss of only three or four lakhs of Rupees by recent failures, its stock should have fallen thirty per cent. But the mystery is easily explained. The Bank is mixed up with so many transactions of a doubtful and dangerous character, from which it can scarcely be extricated without loss, except by a miracle, that the public look at the future with a feeling of dread; and are anxious to avoid being involved in indefinite obligations. Neither has the management of the Bank been such as to secure public confidence; and the determination to maintain the system which has worked well for the few, and ill for the many, has served to perpetuate mistrust. The direction of its affairs has been monopolized by a few Agency Houses in Calcutta, who seem to have had a kind of "standing" seat in the Direction, one member of the firm going out by rotation and another member taking his place. Every effort to break up this system, by which "An Amurath an Amurath succeeds," has been defeated. Under this close borough system, the funds of the Bank have been diverted from banking transactions, and devoted to the assistance of agricultural speculations; to that same species of speculations which drove the great Houses into the Insolvent Court, and reduced thousands to beggary. Of its capital of a hundred lakhs, sixty-three lakhs are thus scattered over the country, with little other security, except the favour of the seasons. Is it any wonder that the public should feel little confidence in such a concern? It is generally understood that the advances thus made, have been confined to six, seven or eight houses; and that the great bulk of the capital has been absorbed in advances to these firms. It is true that this system of advances has been effectually checked, partly from the strong expression of public feeling on the subject, which these discussions have elicited, and partly from the circumstance of the Bank's having no more money to lend; but "confidence is a plant of slow growth," and where it has been so seriously impaired, it will require a long period of good management to restore it.

Mr. Clarke has endeavored to limit the advances for the management of factories to a given sum; but any positive limitation may do more harm than good. Factories become valueless unless they are worked, and the suspension of all assistance may lead to a large sacrifice of capital. What appears to be wanted is the recognition of the sound principle that advances on agricultural enterprises are no part of the legitimate business of the Union Bank. This must be supported by the firmest determination to get out of the scrape as rapidly as possible, and never to get into it again. Mr. Turton's resolutions go far to destroy the pernicious system which has so deeply affected the character and prospects of the Bank; but they do not go quite deep enough. The system must be entirely extirpated; there must not be a single fibre of the root left for future vegetation. If any opening be allowed for such advances, there is reason to fear that, even under the most stringent restriction, it will be enlarged and improved. If any exception whatever be allowed, it will become the rule. As soon as the Bank has collected all the funds which are now in jeopardy in factories and mills, let its exertions be strictly confined to Banking transactions in Calcutta. If it has not sufficient employment for all its capital, let the idle portion of it be restored to the proprietors, to do what they will with it. It is true the Bank will thus shrink into narrower dimensions than it has hitherto occupied. It will no longer be the rival of the Chartered Bank; it will no longer be able to keep shoulder to shoulder with it in the matter of dividends; but it will become a much more useful establishment; and whatever it loses in dignity will be gained in safety. Those who are partial to agricultural enterprizes, and think sugar and indigo and silk speculations safe and profitable, may then form a new association and establish an Agricultural Bank, and lend away their money to their heart's content.

Of the two propositions which are to be considered next Saturday, the one is that the Bank be empowered to buy its own shares, of course with the greatest discretion. Now the Bank consists of the proprietors; and if the proposal be carried, one portion of the proprietors will purchase up, at par, the shares of other proprietors. It is reported that few of the shareholders of the Bank are anxious to buy any more shares, and that many would be happy to be relieved from those they already possess. By the proposed rule, the Directors would be empowered to do that on behalf of the proprietors which the proprietors would by no means consider it adviseable to do themselves. The proprietors would in fact be doing that federally, which they would consider it unwise to do individually.—The other proposal refers to the proxies of absent members, which if carried, would throw a larger and more exclusive power into the hands of certain individuals and firms. Considering that their influence is already too great, and of very doubtful utility, nothing would be so likely to annihilate public confidence, as this injudicious increase of it.—But the June Mail is this moment in, and there must a truce with all parish business.

We have been obliged to omit the statement of the Bank accounts to make room for English news. As it is an important record, we shall give it a place next week. The letter from A Calcutta Agent, we cannot venture to publish. A keen lawyer would find little difficulty in extracting from it the materials for a prosecution.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The last arrival from China brings intelligence that the Sandwich Islands have been provisionally ceded by His Majesty Ka-meha-meha the III., to Queen Victoria, and that the British flag has been hoisted on that group of Islands. Lord George Paulet, arrived at Honolulu in Her Majesty's Ship Caryifort, on the 11th February last, and demanded a personal interview with the King. The King was absent at the time, but returned on the 17th, and declined the interview. Lord George Paulet then sent him a copy of his demands, with an intimation that if they were not complied with by 4 P. M. the next day, he should immediately take coercive steps to obtain redress for his countrymen; that is to say, blow the town to pieces. The next morning the King of the Sandwich islands replied to his Lordship that he had "commissioned Sir George Simpson and William Richards as our ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary to the Court of Great Britain, with full powers to settle these difficulties and to assure her Majesty the Queen of our uninterrupted affection, and to confer with her Ministers as to the best means of cementing the harmony between us." But, said the king, in the mean time we will comply with your demands. The dispute appeared thus to have been amicably settled, and it was agreed that the Queen's representative should be received with due pomp, by an exchange of salutes. Here the correspondence we have received breaks off rather abruptly. On Saturday, the 25th of February, King Ka-meha-meha, "in consequence of the difficulties in which he found himself involved, and the impossibility of complying with the demands in the manner in which they were made," made a cession of the sovereignty of the Islands, the "life of his land," as he expresses it, to the British Crown; and Lord Paulet, in announcing this provisional cession ordered that the British flag should be hoisted on all the islands of the group, and that the Sandwichers should enjoy the protection and privileges of British subjects.

It is difficult to suppose that Lord George Paulet could have made so peremptory a demand, without the fullest instruction from his masters in England, as to the course he was to pursue, if it was refused. The peremptory character of his communication seems clearly to be connected with a design upon the independence of the Islands. Either, therefore, Her Majesty's Ministers were aware at the time of his departure that the French intended to occupy the Tahitan group, and determined to anticipate them in reference to the Sandwich Islands, or there was a secret understanding between the two Courts that the two groups should be respectively occupied by them. This transaction seems to furnish us with a clue to that feeling of complacency which Sir Robert Peel exhibited, when the French aggression at Tahiti was mooted in the House. He knew well that a British man of war was at that very time on its way to the Pacific on a similar errand, and that a much more important group of islands was about to become the property of the British crown, by means equally objectionable. Between the two transactions there is no other difference than the superior value of the prize which we have obtained. In both instances the demand appears to have been made with a view to the result which has happened. In the case of Tahiti, the cession was said to be voluntary; in that of the Sandwich Islands it is called provisional; but the dictates of national ambition will not be long in making it absolute. If we do not denounce this measure with the same vigor with which we denounced the French acquisition, it is only from the fear of repetition; and we beg the reader at once to do us the favour of transfering to this transaction all the reprobation which he will find in our article on Tahiti.

The English, who understand the management of colonial possessions, will probably govern their new islands with more consideration and wisdom than the French are likely to exhibit, and the islanders may probably be more happy under Victoria than they were under Ka-meha-meha the III. or his predecessors, but this will not wash out the original sin of the acquisition. As it regards the result on Missionary operations, it is difficult to speak with any degree of confidence. In this very episcopal age, one of the first measures of the British Government will probably be to send a Bishop to the Sandwich Islands. Now if the assertion of our Puseyite friend, Dousterswivel, be correct, that Episcopal clergymen are bound by their ordination vows, utterly to root out and drive away dissent, we fear the Dissenting ministers who have laboured with such zeal and success for the conversion of the Pagan inhabitants of the Sandwich islands will not fare much better under an Anglican Bishop, than the Missionaries in Tahiti are likely to do under a Catholic Prelate.

The intelligence will probably be received in England with no intense feeling of indignation. The acquisition of territory,—the unavoidable expansion of the Empire,—has always appeared rather a venial crime in the opinion of the English nation. In the case of India, where this principle of expansion has had the freest scope, it has been invariably rebuked with gentleness, and rewarded with munificence. A few patriots, who hate ambition, may make some fuss about this matter in Parliament, and there may be some very eloquent speeches delivered on the occasion; but, on the whole, the great advantage of the position we are thus enabled to occupy, which will be made patent by the rage of the French and the envy of the Americans, will contribute to reconcile our magnanimous countrymen to the calamity. The occupation of these Islands by England will moreover prove the salvation of Lord Ellenborough's Scinde Policy. Every argument which the Ministry employ to defend the acquisition of Honolulu, will tell with ten fold strength in favour of that policy, which, after far greater provocations, has secured to the British Crown a much more valuable possession at the estuary of the Indus.

Since these remarks were written, we have received the London Mail. The intelligence we have alluded to had then reached Europe; and the French press had been thrown into a paroxysm of fury. The "Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary" whom His Majesty Ka-meha-meha the III. had sent to Queen Victoria to settle these differences, were at the Court of King Louis Philip, which looks somewhat suspicious. Of one of the Envoys, Sir George Simpson, we hear nothing, but William Richards the other Minister, is said to be accompanied with one Timoteo Halillio, and they are described as Envoys to the French Court. On hearing of the cession, they protested, "with infinite promptitude," in the Paris papers of Friday the 2d June, against this wanton aggression of England, and threatened her with the consequences. We may therefore expect the next mail to announce the confirmation of the cession.

MR. BLUNDELL.—The Star thinks we have minced the matter of Mr. Blundell's supercession, and that we might have spoken out with more decision. The "capriciousness which can scarcely be distinguished from injustice," our contemporary considers to be absolute and undisguised injustice. We are anxious to set ourselves right with him, and would therefore explain that in the first instance of supercession, not the slightest delinquency was for a moment imputed to Mr. Blundell. The correspondence which passed on the occasion, distinctly shews that the Governor General took advantage of his having applied for furlough in the previous year, to put him on the shelf, and provide for Major Broadfoot. No man will begrudge the Engineer of Jellalabad, the reward of the Commissionership. He has nobly earned his promotion, and we are confident that when sufficiently 'warm in harness,' he will go on smoothly and rapidly, and make the little settlement a great one. At the same time we cannot but lament that a new and pernicious precedent has been created in order to provide for his elevation, at the expense of Mr. Blundell. Major Broadfoot was justly rewarded. Mr. Blundell was unjustly turned out. But neither the nature nor the object of the transaction could be mistaken.

It is not so with the second supercession. Mr. Blundell's post was not required for Col. Butterworth; and he has not been deposed at Penang on the same ground on which he was deposed at Moulmein. That there exists a strong under-current of prejudice against him, is but too apparent. It is just possible that it may have a just foundation; but it is equally probable that the fault may lie with those who cherish the prejudice. His removal is manifestly a penal measure. His guilt must have been contracted at Moulmein, for he had not time to commit any political sins at Penang before he was removed from his Government. If those delinquencies, which could be expiated only by the extreme penalty of dismissal, were known at the time when he was appointed to a post of such high responsibility, Government cannot be exonerated from a dereliction of duty towards the people of the Straits in placing them under one so unfit to govern them. If his transgressions were discovered after his departure, Government appears to have acted unjustly to him, by inflicting punishment before he could be heard in his defence. But in our present ignorance of the circumstances of this case we did not feel ourselves at liberty to speak with the same boldness as in the previous case. It is true that his friends have been unable to discover any other cause for the wrath of Government except the energetic measures he adopted to resist Burmese encroachments. But to suppose that a strong government like this, which has humbled the Dragon throne on the east, and punished obstinacy in Scinde by the forfeiture of a kingdom, should pursue a public servant after he had joined a new appointment, for having shewn something of the same vigor in a subordinate post, appears incredible. We confess that the conduct as well as the motives of the Supreme Government on this occasion, are inexplicable. But we have so frequently erred in our estimate of the measures of Government, and have so often seen cause to withdraw the charge of caprice and injustice after it had been made, that we are anxious to guard against a hasty and erroneous judgement.

Observations on the Journals relative to the Disasters in Affghanistan.—Our last review of the Journals of Lady Sale and Lieuts. Eyre and Melville on the Cabul tragedy made so large a demand on our space, and on the reader's patience, that we were constrained to postpone our concluding observations to the present week.

These publications, while they afford us valuable materials for the history of that disastrous campaign, have by no means exhausted the subject. We have yet a number of circumstances to learn before we are enabled to form a correct opinion of those remarkable events. The journals of Lieuts. Melville and Eyre were drawn up, as we learn, at Buddeabad, from reminiscences of the campaign, then fresh in the memory. Lady Sale's original notes were brushed up and completed in the same retirement, with the aid of hints from the other prisoners. But there are other documents of equal, and possibly of superior, value, which we hope will not be refused to the public. There is reason to believe that Lady Sale was mistaken in supposing that every original record of these events perished in the fatal retreat, except her own. Lady Macnaghten's trunks, which contained a collection of important documents, accompanied her when she placed herself under Akbar Khan's protection. They were not taken from her, and they will afford her deceased husband's relatives at home ample materials for vindicating his character. Sir W. Macnaghten's own official despatch to Government, containing a narrative of these events, to which he made the last addition only a few hours before he fell a victim to the Sirdar's treachery, is safely lodged in the public archives. Two others of the prisoners are known to have kept journals of occurrences, and brought them in safety to India. From these various sources of information we are sure, sooner or later, to be put in possession of the truth; and the history of that period will eventually be as clearly known, as that of any other period.

For this desideratum, however, we must be content to wait. A complete and faithful review of the campaign would exhibit such a series of unparalleled errors, and be fatal to the reputation of so many, both living and dead, that, we can scarcely expect to find the requisite ability united in the same person with the necessary independence of position. It must be written by a soldier; but if he ventured to give us the whole truth, he must relinquish his profession. The army would become too hot for him. If Lady Sale's occasional reference to the individuals whose conduct compromised the safety of the army, has brought her into much odium, it is easy to imagine what a storm of vengeance would pursue the writer who should dare to unfold the mysteries of incapacity which marked the campaign. All that we can expect therefore at present is the publication of memoirs and narratives, in which discretion shall be the prevailing feature. Then, after twenty or twenty-five years have elapsed, and these events have become the property of history, and nothing is to be apprehended from personal enmity, we may look for a bold and impartial history. This must embrace the origin of the insurrection, as exhibited in the records of Government; the course of mismanagement by which it was rendered so fatal; as well as the impression which it produced on the minds of the ruling authorities in India, and the activity or lukewarmness of the efforts made by them to meet the crisis. It must be written with the assistance of the official and private correspondence of the time, and of the public records which are now hermetically sealed; it must be composed in a faithful, impartial, and fearless spirit, and it must deal with the public characters whose conduct it may have occasion to expose, as if they had lived and acted in the days of Cicero and Cæsar.—Among other advantages it will afford another proof how little any contemporary estimate of men and measures is to be depended on.

The events which occurred at Cabul in the winter of 1841, will be found of sufficient interest to justify the labours of the ablest historian. They yield in interest to no events in the History of British India. They arose out of the first effort to check the progress of Russian ambition in the East, which all men had foreseen must, sooner or later, lead to a collision, either in Central Asia, or in Europe, or perhaps in both quarters of the globe. Every previous war in Asia had been intended to baffle local ambition, or to overcome local aggression. In this instance the object was for the first time to arrest the advance of a European power, by occupying Affghanistan, instead of by kindling a war in Europe. The magnitude of the object, which was to establish a paramount influence in Central Asia, in order to shut out our European rival, imparts an unusual importance to the history of the enterprize. The success which at first attended it, in the hold we acquired on Herat and in the liberation of the Russian slaves at the Ultima Thule of Khiva, at the bidding of the Governor General, combined with the subsequent subversion of the system we had built up, the expulsion of our envoy from Herat, and the revolt of Affghanistan, give an interest to these transactions which is attached to no other events in our local History, since the battle of Plassey first made us a political power in India. If any thing be wanting to add to the deep interest of these scenes, it will be found in the entire destruction of a noble army. There is no parallel of such a disaster, not merely in our Indian annals, but in those of Great Britain. Never since we became a nation, and took part in transactions beyond the limits of our own island, has so overwhelming a calamity befallen us;—and seldom has there been exhibited by our public functionaries, such a series of indiscretions, and such apathy, indecision and neglect in affording the means of rescue to a beleaguered army. It is on this latter subject, that the labours of the faithful historian will be most dangerous and invidious. In detailing the errors at Cabul which led to the destruction of the army he will be called to deal,—except in one instance—with the reputation of the dead. In treating of the impression created by this unexpected and appalling crisis, on the minds of those who were at the head of affairs in India, and of the hesitation with which succour was despatched, he will have to touch on matters which affect the credit of the living. It is on this ground that we despair of an impartial History in our own times.

The journals now given to the public amply confirm the suspicion that the complete annihilation of the army is to be traced in some measure to the neglect of the public authorities in India. Knowing as we now do, the state of parties at Cabul, the disposition of the people, the position of our armies from day to day after the retreat had commenced, and the comparative ease with which the troops were enabled to hold out in their cantonments for more than two months after their commissariat stores were destroyed, there is a strong probability that if vigorous measures had been pursued in India to push on reinforcements, more than half the army might have been saved in the retreat, even if the necessity of a retreat had not been altogether obviated. The courage of the Affghans, and the boldness of their chiefs arose, for the most part, from our own deficiencies. It was not till three days after the outbreak had commenced, nor till it was discovered that there was no spirit left in the cantonments, that the chiefs who had been favourable to our interests, abandoned our party and joined the enemy. It was the total absence of any appearance of succour from India which gave confidence to Akbar Khan and his associates. Had there been two well equipped regiments at Gundamuk in the beginning of January, the precursors of a relieving army, the aspect of affairs at the Capital and the tone of the leaders, would have been entirely changed; and if retreat had become unavoidable, it would not have been attended with those tragical results we have now to deplore. The certainty of co-operation from a body of fresh troops, burning with ardour to vindicate the national character, would have sustained the spirits of our men who had given themselves up to despair, and on the other hand cooled down the ferocity of the Affghans. We believe there is scarcely an individual among the liberated officers who does not believe that the arrival at Jellalabad, at that crisis, of the four regiments which were sent on, would have proved the salvation of the army. Every thing was favourable for such a consummation. The troops had been already assembled on the banks of the Sutlege, to relieve the returning brigade, and they were ready to move; the Commander-in-Chief was himself in the Western Provinces, and might have been at Ferozepore in a week to superintend the despatch of succours. The Khyber was not closed, as it was after our sun had set at Cabul. By such extraordinary exertions as the emergency demanded, those four Regiments might have reached Jellalabad by the 1st of January. There were difficulties in the way no doubt, but they were not insuperable; there was no impossibility in the case. But days were wasted when hours were invaluable To secure this object it was only necessary that the same energy should have been displayed, which was exhibited by the Head of the army in England during the last year, when an insurrection broke out in the manufacturing counties. As soon as the first intelligence of this disturbance reached the Horse Guards, there was no repose till an overwhelming force had been poured into the district. Troops made their appearance on the scene as if they had been brought by the power of magic. A large body was marshalled on the spot, ready for action, before it was supposed that any notice of the emergency could have reached the Ministry; and the insurrection was strangled in its cradle. If the same spirit had been manifested here, we should not now have to lament the direst calamity which ever befel our arms. On the other hand, if the same spirit of indecision and comparative indifference which retarded the departure of the troops, and sent them at length without sufficient equipment, had been exhibited in England on that occasion, the insurrection would in all probability have gained strength till it was matured into a servile war, and had involved our manufacturing interests in ruin.

VIVA VOCE COMPLAINTS BEFORE THE MAGISTRATE.—Mr. Montrieu, who has just been appointed to the Magistracy in Calcutta, resolved, it was said, to exclude all written petitions, and to constrain those who sought redress to prefer their complaints before him by word of mouth. This innovation appeared to us preposterous, and we ventured to express our disapprobation of it. We subsequently learned that the new rule was not to be compulsory, the suitors having simply been informed that a written petition was not necessary, as a verbal complaint would be received, if they preferred it. This entirely alters the character of the measure, and obviates the objection which appeared to lie against it. When the mode of complaint is thus left optional with the aggrieved party, the innovation appears worthy of commendation, in as much as it will afford an opportunity of ascertaining how far this plan is calculated to promote the ends of justice, and this will be manifested by the preference which it may receive from the natives. We think that the habits of the country, and the feelings of the people would be a bar to its general adoption, except in cases in which the Magistrate was so thoroughly acquainted with the language, as at once to win the confidence of the parties. Where a man is compelled to appear in person before a Magistrate and state his case, obstacles will inevitably be thrown, by interested officials, in the way of his approach, and he will consider it necessary to buy access to the Huzoor. The obstacles would be greater in the country than in town, where the natives have acquired considerable boldness; but the difficulty would more or less be supposed to exist. When the complaint has to be translated to the Magistrate by an interpreter, the discomfited suitor will always attribute his defeat to the ignorance or venality of the interpreter, and the character of the Court will be in some measure involved in odium. If his plaint must be presented to the bench in a foreign language, it is more politic to allow him to choose his own translator, than to constrain him to depend on the official interpreter. Some men will feel themselves so dumbfounded, when brought in person before the Magistrate, as to be unable to do justice to their own case. These and other considerations led us to question the propriety of forcing the new practice on a people always indisposed to innovation; but as we before stated, every objection is removed when it is left optional with suitors to appear either with a written petition or a verbal complaint.

We fear we fell into a grievous error last week in confounding Mr. J. B. Norton of the Madras bar, with Mr. George Norton, the Advocate General. It appears to be the former gentleman who is opposed to the appointment of the new Registrar, and the latter who is prepared to defend it.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JULY 13.

— Yesterday evening's Government Gazette announces, that Major General Simpson, of Her Majesty's 29th Foot, has been placed at the disposal of Sir Charles Napier for employment in Scinde. Capt. Baker, of Engineers, at present Superintendent of the Delhi Canals, has also been sent to Scinde, to be employed in the survey and superintendence of the water courses, canals, and forests of the country. The fertility of a considerable portion of the newly acquired territory depends upon keeping up the canals; and there can be little doubt that the disafforesting of the forests, would not only contribute to the comfort of the people, but to the salubrity of the country.

— The constitution of the several Studs has been remodelled. They will in future constitute one general department, remaining as usual under the control of the Military Board. The department will consist of two divisions, that of the North Western, and that of the Central Provinces. The salaries will be thus arranged; 2 Superintendents at 1000 Rs. a month, 2 First Class Assistants at 400, 2 Second Class, at 300 and 5 Sub-Assistants, at 200 Rs. Lieut. Col. Gwatkin takes the superintendence of one division, and Capt. Moyle Sheres of the other.

— An assault was made some time since attended with loss of life, by men of the 20th Regiment N. I. on the gun lascars and drivers attached to No. 14 light field battery. A Court of Enquiry was held on the subject, the result of which having been laid before the Commander-in-Chief, His Excellency stated in General Orders that such an outrage could not have been committed without the knowledge and connivance of the Native Commissioned and non-Commissioned officers, some of whom endeavoured to screen the guilty. As a punishment for this offence, it is ordered that no furloughs shall be granted to the corps this year, and that all promotion in it shall be suspended for a twelvemonth.

— The Bombay Times states, that H. M. S. the Endymion, which was under orders to proceed to England immediately after the arrival of the mail, has been detained; and it is reported that she remains to take home the Governor General. This is the second vessel which the papers have destined to convey His Lordship to England.

— The Bombay has reached the port of the same name from Plymouth, in Eighty days, which is considered one of the most remarkable passages on record.

— The Englishman of this morning makes some reference to the Roman Catholic organ in England, the Tablet, which, under its present Editor has been remarkable for the virulence of its hostility to Protestantism. "For our parts," says the Editor of the Tablet, "these poor Puseyites who stand shivering at St. Peter's threshold, spending all their ingenuity and devoting the whole energy of their minds to the drawing of subtle distinctions and to discovering how much of Catholicism they can (they think) safely disbelieve, or how much they can safely avow, without trenching on their thirty-nine articles,—we say these poor people who live in daily sight and contemplation of the most glorious and necessary truths, and no less in the daily neglect of them, these are the people for whom we tremble, and for whose future state we fear and stand aghast." Who would have thought that such sentiments could flow from a man formerly a Quaker; from one who made so strenuous an effort some time past to introduce the warmth of evangelical feeling into that body? He has now turned Papist, and is, we are told, the Editor of the Tablet.

— There is a vessel from China of the 29th of May, which announces the arrival of some Mandarins at Hong Kong where they were received with much distinction, and witnessed the imposing ceremony of conferring the highest order of the Bath on Sir W. Parker.

FRIDAY, JULY 14.

— It is stated that Lord Ellenborough, after having viewed the barracks at Berhampore, which are among the finest in India, but have been abandoned because of their unhealthiness, expressed a wish again to place a European corps there. The Englishman is doing all in his power to dissuade his Lordship from such a course. It appears that the expense of these barracks was ascertained some time ago from the office of the Military Board and the Accountant General, to have been nearly seventeen millions sterling; but on looking into the account we find that sixteen millions of this sum consists of compound interest on the outlay for 77 years; rather an odd mode of computing the cost of a building. At this rate Westminster Hall must have cost a sum which figures cannot comprize. It is stated moreover that the barracks cost 38 lakhs in the year 1757, which is impossible. The battle of Plassey was fought on the 21st of June of that year, and certainly the barracks were not finished in six months after.

— The Governor General proceeded to Calcutta yesterday, and landed in a private manner, accompanied only by his own staff. His Lordship refused to allow the troops to be drawn out either at Barrackpore or at Calcutta, from a consideration for their comfort.

— The Bengal Spectator has taken us to task for having ranked the Hare Testimonial among the city bubbles. He informs us that 10,487 Rs. were subscribed, of which a little more than half has been collected; and that every exertion is making to collect the balance. In this the Committee are likely to meet with indifferent success. The money already realized is safely lodged with the Union Bank and in Government Securities. Enquiries have also been instituted in England whether a full sized marble or bronzed statue can be obtained for such a sum. We are happy to have elicited the information, and communicate it with much pleasure to our readers.

— The Hurkaru states, that since that very singular decision in the case of Boyd and Co. versus Piddington, there have been upwards of 17 suits non-suited in the Court of the 24-Pergunnahs. In our copy of the paper, there is apparently a figure to the right of the 7 invisible. It is more likely to be 170 than 17 suits. The defendants after being served with a summons, absconded into Calcutta. We would earnestly recommend to the Deputy Governor to abolish all the Civil Courts in the 24-Pergunnahs, as a useless charge on the public treasury. According to the last dictum of the Sudder Court, if a defendant on being summoned, crosses the boundary and gets within the Ditch, (which he must be an infinite ass not to do)—the case falls to the ground. The Court will soon be as much at a loss for plaintiffs as it now is for defendants.

SATURDAY, JULY 15.

— The Delhi Gazette states, that Raja Dhyan Sing, the powerful Mayor of the palace in the Punjab, has regularly quarrelled with Shere Sing and has retreated to the mountain fastnesses of his own domains in Jumboo, and that the Maha Raja has sent General Ventura to bring him to reason with fourteen Regiments of Infantry, two of cavalry and a brigade of guns. The Minister however has an equally powerful army of his own; and also the superior advantage of a difficult and almost inaccessible country. If discord once gains admittance into the Punjab, its independence is gone, whoever be Governor General.

— All apprehension regarding the Ameer Shere Mahomed is at an end. Being hemmed in on all sides by the toils of Sir Charles Napier, he faced the weakest of his opponents, and came down upon Capt. Jacob of the Scinde Irregular Horse, with about 4000 men, and three guns. His whole army fled on receiving a few shots from our artillery. The Ameer himself has escaped in the direction of the desert, with ten or twelve followers. The spirits of the Belochees appear to be completely broken; and unless we lose the country by our own folly, we are not likely to lose it by the energy or valor of the enemy.

MONDAY, JULY 17.

— The Bombay Times gives us reason to hope that the June Mail may be here this evening. It was expected at Bombay on the 6th or 7th. The roads are now heavy, and the regular mail has of late frequently been twelve days on the route. We can scarcely therefore expect the Express to make the journey under ten days.

— Sir Charles Napier in his despatches to Government of the 19th June stated that a sudden change of the weather to extraordinary heat just after the troops marched from Hydrabad, had proved fatal to many of the Europeans, who were struck down by the sun and died within a few hours. He had thus lost in the field, 1 Lieutenant, 2 Sergeants, and 29 Rank and File. In the fort of Hydrabad, there had at the same time been carried off by the same cause, 3 Sergeants, 1 Drummer, and 14 Rank and File. In all 50 individuals.

— A Decree has been obtained in the Delhi Court against the eldest son of the King, and an order was issued to seize all his property which was found beyond the Palace. The decree was no sooner known than he took steps to remove his property beyond its reach, and to place it in safety within the precincts of that sanctuary.

— The Delhi Gazette mentions that leave has been refused to Mr. George Thompson, by the British authorities at Delhi, to enter the palace and see the King!! This is an act of such superlative folly that we suspect our Western contemporary must have been misinformed.

TUESDAY, JULY 18.

— The Bengal Spectator again adverts to the circumstance that eight years have passed since a fund was raised for a testimonial in honour of the late Rammohun Roy, and a Committee appointed to carry the design into execution; and that nothing has since been heard of the matter. The Editor a twelve month ago called on the Committee to inform the public of the steps which they had adopted in furtherance of the design. But the Committee still continues in a state of "profound somnolency," and the public is yet kept in a state of "cimmerean darkness."

— All the accounts from the Western Provinces mention the fall of copious showers of rain, by which the excessive heat has been allayed, and the hopes of the husbandmen revived. In the lower Provinces, so dry a season has not been known for many years. Up to the present day, the 18th of July, there has scarcely been one hearty shower. We have had just rain enough to encourage the flowers, but not enough to invigorate the rice crops, which must suffer severely, unless there is a much more plentiful supply.

— The Bombay papers, on the authority of letters from Hydrabad, describe the mode in which General Napier hemmed in the "last of the Ameers" Shere Mahomed, and obliged him to take to the desert with only a dozen followers. Col. Roberts was ordered to advance from the North; Sir Charles himself moved up from the South, while Capt. Jacob with the Scinde irregular Horse advanced against him from the East. The Ameer, thus encompassed, made an attack on the weakest of his opponents, and advanced against Capt. Jacobs, the first few shots from whose guns, dispersed his force. There was a report at Hydrabad that he had been taken, but it wants confirmation. Upper Scinde is said to be in a state of tranquillity and the dawks between Hydrabad and Bhooj have been re-established.

— The Mortons which left Bombay with 294 coolies for the Mauritius, has returned with six of them whom the Governor would not allow to remain, because they did not answer to the descriptions given of them in the certificates. These men had taken the certificates granted to others. The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette says, that 150 were returned to Madras on the same ground, the substitution of one cooly for another who had made himself scarce on the day of embarkation. The punishment now inflicted on this fraud is likely to produce an effectual cure.

— The Bank of Bombay has declared a dividend at the rate of Seven Per Cent. per annum. Business does not appear to be altogether so profitable there as in Calcutta where the chartered Bank has just declared a dividend of double that amount.

— The London Mail of the 6th of June reached Calcutta yesterday evening. We have given Copious extracts from it below.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

General Remarks.—The affairs of India have during the past month, been very sparingly discussed, either by the public press or in parliament; a forbearance which is solely attributable to apprehensions raised by a report, said to have reached Bombay two hours before the departure of the April mail, to the effect that another action had been fought near Hydrabad, in which Sir C. Napier had fallen. As soon as this matter is set at rest by the receipt of official advices, there is every reason to believe that Lord Ellenborough's policy will be very freely discussed both in and out of parliament. At the same time we must observe, that though the annexation of Scinde to the British territories was at first denounced as a violation of the principles laid down in his lordship's previous proclamations, the abolition of slavery and the beneficial results likely to flow from an unrestricted navigation of the Indus, have gone far to reconcile public opinion to an act, which, if at all, can only be justified upon such grounds as these.

The present mail will convey intelligence of the decease of Lord Fitzgerald, the value of whose services as President of the Board of Control, the records of the office afford but scanty means of judging. There was, however, one measure to which his declining energies were devoted, which we sincerely trust will not be postponed by his decease. Immediately upon receipt of Sir C. Napier's remonstrance, perhaps before, his lordship appears to have consulted some officers of distinction; and we believe that there is no doubt that before his death he had come to the conclusion that it was essentially necessary that, at least, a captain should be added to every regiment in the service of the East India Company. How far Lord Ripon may adopt the views of his predecessor upon this or any other subject it is impossible to say; but as the Court of Directors are understood to be in favour of such an augmentation, it will no doubt be granted, if pressed for by the heads of the public service in India.

The financial statement of Mr. Goulburn, which was looked forward to with so much anxiety, shows, after all, a deficiency of at least two millions in the revenue, though the Income tax has proved much more productive than was anticipated. But it is perhaps more unsatisfactory still, in so far as it goes to prove the existing state of things to be such, that it is impossible to calculate, with any approximation to accuracy, what the resources of the country can produce. In this respect Sir R. Peel appears to have been lamentably mistaken; for, in 1842, taking a low figure, he estimated that the customs would produce 21,500,000*l.* whereas it has yielded only 20,750,000*l.*—that the Excise would produce 13,700,000*l.*, yet it has returned only 12,500,000*l.*, and so on as respects various other particulars; showing that the whole revenue under ordinary heads, instead of 47,640,000, has only produced 45,600,000*l.* If to this difference is added the Chinese ransom—725,000*l.*, not calculated upon in 1842, and also 650,000*l.* corn duty, we shall have a difference of 3,375,000*l.* upon the year. Of course, all this has furnished the Opposition with grounds upon which to assail Ministers; but though Repeal, the Irish Arms Bill, the Corn Laws, and the Education clauses of the Factories Bill have occasioned them some little trouble, the only serious difficulty they have had to encounter has sprung from the conduct of their general supporters upon the subject of the Canada Corn Bill. This at one time assumed a very threatening aspect, a hostility having been aroused, which was only neutralised by the declaration of Sir R. Peel, at a meeting convened at his own residence, that the Government were prepared, if necessary, to go out of office upon the question. The measure is one permitting the introduction of Canada wheat at one shilling, and American wheat ground in Canada at four shillings, per quarter; but the real objection would seem to be the principle of a fixed duty thus recognised. As the two Canadas do not raise wheat sufficient for themselves, there is really little to fear from that quarter; especially as Lord Stanley has shown, that the price at Montreal averages from forty-five to fifty shillings a quarter, to which if we add duty, carriage, freight, &c. to England, we shall have the price several shillings above the present average in this country.

The aspect of affairs in Ireland is one of very threatening importance, the entire country having been roused to a state of fearful agitation upon the question of a Repeal. The Duke of Wellington and Sir R. Peel have, on the part of the Queen, reiterated the declaration made by his late Majesty upon this question in 1843; and, as a means of maintaining the legislative union vi et armis an immense military force has been sent from this country. A Battalion of marines is on its passage to Cork, and orders have been issued that recruiting shall be recommenced, in order to add sixty men to each regiment of the line, except those serving in India and China.

The Secession from the Church of Scotland, as by law established, has taken place, and is now as complete as could by possibility have been anticipated, either by the party who dreaded the effect of such separation upon the interests of true religion, or those who saw in such a movement the promotion of pure scriptural presbyterianism. The disruption has taken place, and, be it for weal or be it for woe, matters have gone too far to admit of re-union; unless a compromise be effected at the sacrifice of principles to which both parties are so deeply pledged, that the idea of retraction cannot be entertained. On the one hand the Veto Act has been repealed; the deposition of the Strathbogie ministers, passed by the last General Assembly, has been rescinded as an unjust sentence, and in excess of power; and the members of the Secession have been formally proclaimed to be no longer members of the Church, and their churches and chapels are declared to be vacant. On the other, a formal Act of Separation from the Establishment has been passed; the seceders protesting that they truly represent the Church, and "shall not be subject in any respect to the ecclesiastical judicatories presently established by law." We cannot imagine how the effect of such an ecclesiastical revolution as this is to be met by the bill which Lord Aberdeen has introduced, for it only goes to the admission and settlement of ministers, not quoad sacra.

As far as we can collect, nearly half the entire clergy of Scotland have joined the secession, and among them are to be found men of distinguished piety and talent. Though Dr. Chalmers repudiates the title of "voluntaries," about 230,000*l*. have been raised in a few weeks for the erection of the new churches, and for the support of the seceding clergy; and the amount will, in a few days probably, exceed 300,000*l*. Among the contributors are the Marchioness of Breadalbane, 1,000*l*.; a colonel in the army, 6,000*l*.; Mr. H. Paul, a private gentleman, 2,000*l*.; Mr. Nisbet, bookseller, London, 1,000*l*.; a Dissenter, 500*l*.; and numerous other subscribers of 2,000*l*. and 1,000*l*. each. Mr. Fox Maule is to build and endow a church at his own expence; Mr. A. Campbell, member for Argyleshire, is to do the same. The Duke of Argyle has given ground as sites for such new churches as they may require in Campbeltown; and report says the Marquis of Breadalbane will give 10,000*l*. From all this the importance of the movements and strength of the seceders, may be collected. In our subsequent pages will be found full particulars respecting this and various other matters of peculiar interest to our readers in India.—London Mail.

COURT AND FASHION.—Her Majesty, the Queen, entered her 25th year on the 24th of May.

The papers state on authority that the Queen Dowager does not intend to visit Germany this year.

His Majesty the King of Hanover landed at the Customhouse on June 2nd, in a steam-packet from Calais.

The ceremony of the baptism of Her Royal Highness the Infant Princess, second daughter of Her Majesty and Prince Albert was performed in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace, on the 2nd of June, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Norwich. The sponsors were the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess of Kent, the Princess Sophia Matilda, and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz; and her Royal Highness was named "Alice Maud Mary."

The Queen had nominated His Royal Highness Prince Albert, K.G., to be the First and Principal Knight Grand Cross of the Most Hon. Order of the Bath, and Acting Great Master of the said Most Hon. Order, in the room of His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, deceased.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, K.G., has been appointed Governor and Constable of Her Majesty's Castle of Windsor, in the room of Augustus Frederic, Duke of Sussex, deceased.

An association has been formed for the suppression of duelling. It consists of 326 members, including 21 noblemen, 13 sons of noblemen, 16 members of Parliament, 15 baronets, 30 admirals and generals, 44 captains R.N., 23 colonels and lieutenant colonels, 17 majors, 26 captains in the army, 20 lieutenants R. N., and 24 barristers. They denounce duelling as sinful, irrational, and contrary to the laws of God and man. They also pledge themselves to discountenance by influence and example a practice which so greatly dishonours God. Capt. Hope, R. N., and Mr. W. Dunmore, have become hon. secretaries to the association.

Campbell, the secretary of the Chartists, who by his letters, exhortations, and denunciations was chiefly instrumental in exciting those deluded men to acts of outrage, violence, and rebellion, and who, by following his vocation, lived and fared well, as all moneys passed through his hands, and he could, therefore, remunerate himself, has winged his flight across the Atlantic to America. He has taken with him the books of the Chartist Association, which bore, it is reported, glaring discrepancies and evident falseness. Campbell was convicted with the other conspirators at Lancaster, and was to have come up for judgment to the Queen's Bench. Previous to his departure, he threatened to write a pamphlet, in which he would expose "the villany, treachery, rascality, and venality of Feargus." Want of funds alone, he said, prevented him giving this precious document to the world. Feargus O'Connor, in vindicating himself from the charges made against him by Campbell, O'Brien, and others of his party, who accuse him of having sold and resold himself to different parties, has adopted the et tu quoque argument by charging his opponents with similar political delinquencies. He also insinuates that Sturge's party are dishonest, and calls upon them to produce their accounts and balance-sheet. He says that Joseph Sturge owes him a new hat and the price of a warm plaster. He also threatens to prove that Messrs. Cobden, Bright, Villiers, Thompson, and all the leading members of the League, travel, eat, and drink at the expense of those who subscribed the 50,000*l*. He denounces his own party in no measured language for not coming forward to support him. Speaking of them, he says, "You are, in a word, a poor, beggarly, lousy set of devils. That's just what you are. Crawling sycophants! A nation of servile mendicants!"

The Naval and Military Bible Society assembled on the 7th, the Marquis of Cholmondely in the chair. The Society had distributed 11,472 Bibles and Testaments in the year; the receipts, including a bequest of 500*l*. from Mr. T. Walker, were 3,251*l*.; the expenditure, 3,220*l*. The Merchant Seamen's Orphan Asylum dined at the London Tavern on the same day, the Earl of Haddington presiding. The subcriptions of the day amounted to 332*l*. The Protestant Association met on the 8th, Mr. Plumptre chairman. The report detailed the presentation of between two and three hundred petitions to Parliament, and the distribution of 167,952 tracts and 2,300 volumes. The receipts for the year were 1,500*l*., the debt of the Society 300*l*. The foundation of the Magdalen Hospital was celebrated on the same day, Lord Skelmersdale occupying the chair. The St. Ann's School Society dined at the London Tavern, with Lord Morpeth at the head of the table; the donations of the evening, headed by the Queen and Queen Dowager, amounted to more than 1,000*l*. The London Missionary Society met at Exeter Hall on 9th: they report an income of 78,000*l*., and activity all over the world. The anniversary festival of the Sons of the Clergy took place at St. Paul's Cathedral on the same day. The fifty-fourth anniversary of the Literary Fund was celebrated on 8th, when several handsome donations were announced; among them, the Queen, 100 guineas; the Emperor of Russia, 1,000 silver roubles (155*l*. 18*s*. 6*d*.), and Baron Brunow, 10 guineas; the American Minister 10 guineas; the Duke of Sutherland, 100*l*.; the Archbishop of Dublin, 10 percent, on his works, 8*l*. 18*s*. 6*d*: total, 800*l*.

The following appointments have taken place:—Thomas Pemberton Leigh, Esq., Q. C. (late M. P. for Ripon,) to be Chancellor of the Duchy of Cornwall; the Hon. I. S. Talbot, Q. C., attorney-general to the duchy, and also attorney-general to the Prince of Wales; George Edward Anson, Esq., Treasurer of the Household and Cofferer to the Prince of Wales; James Robert Gardiner, Esq., Secretary and Clerk of the Council to the Prince of Wales, and Keeper of the Records of the Duchy of Cornwall; and Edward White, Esq., to be Auditor of the Duchy of Cornwall.

The Protestant Home Missionary Society held its twenty-fourth annual meeting on the 16th. The society has in connexion with it 70 missionaries, 158 agents, 210 schools, 13,000 scholars; during the year 61 new stations were formed, having 655 preachers, teaching 50,000 people; the income was 7,788*l*, the expenditure 9,334*l*.—The National School Society met on the 17th, when the children of the Central School were examined in their studies, including music. The number of schools is now 259, of scholars 42,900; the expenditure last year was 11,900*l*.

Mr. Brunel has been relieved from the coin which had got into his windpipe. An account of the method of relief, signed S. T., has been sent to the papers.

Upon the rejection of Mr. Villiers' motion on the Corn-laws in the House of Commons, the deputies assembled in London from all parts of the country came to the following resolution—viz., "That this conference recommends the League forthwith to commence a registration of the electors of the kingdom, in order to be prepared at the earliest possible period to call upon the Queen's advisers, through the constitutional means of a humble memorial to Her Majesty, to dissolve the present Parliament, and thus afford to the electors of the kingdom an opportunity of revising their late decision upon the question of the Corn-law."

FROM 22D TO 27TH MAY.—Mr. Lockhart has been appointed auditor of the Duchy of Cornwall, in the room of the late Mr. Allen. The salary is about 400*l*. per annum, and the duties will not interfere with Mr. Lockhart's literary engagements.

There has been a very ugly affray at Manchester, in which the soldiers of the 15th Regt. have been united with the populace in a riot. On this occasion the alliance was against the police. The officers of the regiment are said to have looked on while their men from the barracks pelted the police escorting the prisoners to the gaol. The protection of the town is entrusted to the 16th Regt.

The first member of the Arkwright family, who made a noise in the world, was Sir R. Arkwright, who was born of humble parentage, at Preston, in Lancashire, on the 23rd Dec. 1732. His first effort in mechanics was an attempt to discover the perpetual motion; and this direction having been given to his mind, the result was the invention of the machinery for spinning cotton with rollers, better known as the "spinning-jenny." In 1769, Mr. Arkwright obtained his first patent, and commenced a manufacturing concern, which he carried on with Messrs. Need and Strutt. In 1784, he was appointed high sheriff of the county of Derby; and on the occasion of presenting an address of congratulation to George III., on his escaping the attempt of assassination by Margaret Nicholson, he received the honour of knighthood. Sir R. Arkwright died on the 3rd August, 1792, at the age of sixty, remarkable for his mental energy and application to business to the very last, and leaving a fortune of about half a million sterling—a fortune which it appears, in the hands of his descendant, who has just died, has increased to seven millions and a half.

On the 30th May the address of the electors and inhabitants of the West Riding of Yorkshire, agreed to at a public meeting in Wakefield, at which Earl Fitzwilliam presided, was presented by deputation to Viscount Morpeth. It bore the signatures of 38,674 of the noble viscount's supporters and friends.

For steamers iron has been a favourite for some time past, and there is not now one wooden steamer building at Liverpool, while we observe there are two iron ones of the first class nearly completed, and we understand contracts are made for the building of three more. We are also now satisfied that the only objection to sailing vessels of iron—namely, the getting foul during a foreign voyage—is completely removed. This is proved by the result of two voyages by the Iron Queen. This bark, of 350 tons register, left the river Tyne in February, 1842, with 424 tons of coals for Havannah, whence she went to Mobile for a cargo of cotton for Liverpool. She has now completed another voyage, from Liverpool to Galveston, in Texas, carrying 300 tons of coals out and a full cargo of cotton home. She had been in the graving dock, where she was visited by many persons, and she is found not to have strained a single rivet, although she struck heavily on Galveston-bar. There is no appearance of corrosion, the red-lead being fresh on the plates, and neither shells, barnacles, nor any foulness was on her bottom. This desirable result is caused by the single application of a compound of tallow, bright varnish, arsenic, and brimstone, which effectually destroys marine vegetable and animal substances.

On the 18th May Sir H. Hardinge stated that he had received a letter from Lord Ellenborough, to the effect that he had been in correspondence with between thirty and forty gentlemen in the civil and military services, all of whom declared that they had never heard anything of the excesses stated by the press to have been committed by our troops in Affghanistan.

In reply to Gen. Johnson, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that six months' batta had been given to the naval and military forces engaged in China.

On 19th of May, in answer to Mr. W. Stanley, who inquired, amidst loud laughter, whether, in the event of the gates of Somnath not being required in India, there would be any objection to deposit them in the British Museum? Sir R. Peel said he was not surprised at the anxiety of the hon. member to obtain for this country those valuable gates. By an official letter lately received from Lord Ellenborough, he learned that at that advanced season it was not deemed advisable to carry the gates further than Agra, and there he proposed for the present to leave them. (A laugh.) [He read the following passage].—"It is satisfactory to observe that there has been no other than a feeling of gratitude to the Government for having restored the gates to Hindoostan. There has been no appearance of any religious feeling among the Mussulmans indisposing them to the power which has achieved for all Hindoostan a national triumph."

On the 22nd, the Marquis of Clanricarde put several questions respecting the late transactions in Scinde, and the annexation of that country to the British territories, to which, in the absence of official advices, the Duke of Wellington appeared unable to give satisfactory replies.

On 25th May, in answer to a question from Mr. Mangles, Mr. Baring said that no despatch had been sent out to Lord Ellenborough with respect to the gates of Somnath.

Sir R. Inglis put some questions upon the subject of idolatry in India, to which Sir R. Peel replied, that in the month of August, 1841, the late President of the Board of Control had signified to the Governor-General of India, the wish of her Majesty's Government, that all connexion between the officers of the East India Company and the ceremonies connected with the worship of mosques and pagodas, should be discontinued; and moreover, that all interference on the part of those officers in the management of the land and other revenues of those mosques and pagodas should also cease. Orders to that effect were issued, in consequence of those directions; and from the reports on the subject obtained from the collectors, he had the satisfaction of saying that it was their concurrent opinion that there would be no difficulty whatever in severing all connexion between the officers of the East India Company and the worship of those mosques and pagodas.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The Right Hon. William Vesey Fitzgerald, Baron Fitzgerald, President of the Board of Control for the Affairs of India, Custos Rotulorum of the county of Clare, and Colonel of the Clare Militia, expired at his residence in Belgrave-square, early on the morning of 11th May. His Lordship's first official appointment was that of Chancellor of the Irish Exchequer, the abolition of which was necessarily consequent on the consolidation of the English and Irish Treasuries His next appointment was that of Paymaster-General of the Forces, which office he held during the years 1826 and 1827. In the Wellington Ministry, namely, from 1828 till 1830, he filled the office of President of the Board of Trade. This, of course, he resigned when Lord Grey became head of the Government; and, during the last Melbourne Ministry, namely, from 1835 till 1841, he remained in opposition, occasionally addressing the House of Lords, but not taking a very active part in public affairs. When the present administration was formed, in the autumn of 1841, Lord Fitzgerald became President of the Board of Trade, the duties of which he continued to discharge up to the period of Lord Ellenborough's appointment to the government of India, when his services were transferred to the Board of Control. Upon the decease of his mother, in 1832, the honour of the Irish barony devolved upon his lordship, who, in 1835, obtained a peerage of the United Kingdom, by the title of Baron Fitzgerald, of Desmond and Clangibbon, in the county of Cork. As his lordship has died without leaving male issue, the British peerage becomes extinct: but he is succeeded in the Irish barony of Fitzgerald and Vesey by his brother, the Hon. and Very Rev. Dr. Henry Fitzgerald.

Lord Fitzgerald has left his small estate near Limerick, of 200*l.* a year, to his brother, the present peer: the rents of his estates in Clare and Galway to accumulate until the death of the present lord, to whose heir, when he attains the age of twenty-one, he bequeaths the said accumulated sum and estates; but in failure of male issue, the money and estates descend to the eldest sons of his sisters, the widows of Sir Ross Mahon and Baron Foster, the former the Galway, the latter of the Clare estate. His lordship's personal property, exceeding 150,000*l.* he leaves to his two illegitimate children, one of whom is married to an eminent physician in London. He also bequeaths 5000*l.* to Mrs Baron Foster. The principal executor is his late private secretary, son of Mr. Cane, of Dawson-street, Dublin.

Among others we have to announce the deaths of Dowager Countess Anson; Dowager Lady Peter; Lieut.-Gen. Sir J. Ross, Colonel of the 46th Regt.; Lieut.-Gen. Le Mesurier; Major-Gen. O'Malley; Major-Gen. C. S. Fagan, C.B.; Sir Bentinck Cavendish Doyle; Sir James Nugent, Bart.; Rev. W. Chafy, D.D., Master of Sydney College, Cambridge; Mr. Frederick Tyrrell, the eminent surgeon; Mrs. Davenport, the actress.—London Mail.

IRELAND.—The Repeal Agitation has assumed so serious an aspect as to demand a public declaration from both the Duke of Wellington and Sir R. Peel, of their determination to maintain the legislative Union, at no matter what sacrifice. Public meetings have been held, at which masses of the lower orders averaging from 150,000 to 500,000 persons, were addressed by Mr. O'Connell and others, and the state of the entire country is at the present moment one of fearful agitation. The Roman Catholic Hierarchy, with exception of Dr. Murray, Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Murphy, Bishop of Cork, and Dr. Ryan, Bishop of Limerick, have joined the movement; but save Lord French, none of the nobility and few of the respectable gentry have identified themselves with the present agitation. Troops have been marched into all parts of the country, and it is said Sir R. Peel means to apply to Parliament for additional powers to crush the seditious movements now in progress throughout three parts of Ireland, and a portion of the fourth. Sir E. Sugden has dismissed Lord Ffrench, Mr. O'Connell, Mr. J. P. Somers, M. P., Sligo, Mr. J. Roe, Tipperary, Mr. J. M. M'Donnell, Doo Castle, Mr. Phillips, Mayo, Mr. Fitzgerald, Muckridge, the Hon. Pierce Butler, M. P., R. D. Browne, M. P., Sir M. D. Bellew, Mr. A. Sherlock, Mr. C. Powell, M. P. for Limerick, Mr. J. O'Hea, Cork, Mr. Sinclair, Donegal, and others, from the commission of the peace for taking part in the Repeal movement; Mr. O'Connell in a letter to the secretary of Sir E. Sugden says—"As the restoration of the Irish parliament is an event in my judgment not remote, I will avail myself of the opportunity afforded by a seat in the Irish House of Commons to move for an impeachment of the present Lord Chancellor for presuming to interfere with the subject's dearest and most precious right—the right of petitioning Parliament—a right expressly declared to belong to the people as one of 'the true, ancient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this realm.' I use the words of the statute, which, it should be remembered, settles the succession of the Crown upon the basis of those rights and liberties of the subject." An official circular has been despatched to lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants of counties, apprising them that such as have taken part in the repeal agitation, since the Royal declaration in both houses of Parliament, shall be visited with the marked displeasure of Her Majesty's Government, by the cancelling of their commissions. It is also stated that orders will be issued to all gentlemen holding these appointments immediately to repair to their respective counties in case of services being required there.

Preparations on an extended scale continue to be made for the reception of additional reinforcements, naval as well as military; and certainly if the agitation is to be checked or even overawed by the presence of large military bodies, the authorities appear to be taking a very decided step towards effecting so desirable an object.

At Oxford a vast sensation has been created by a sermon preached by Dr. Pusey, to a large congregation at Christ Church, in which he publicly and without reserve professed and taught the great fundamental doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, namely Transubstantiation. The text taken was that which describes the institution of the Lord's Supper—Matthew xxvi. 26, 27, 28 v.; compared with John vi., 54. Dr. Pusey took these texts in the literal sense. In the first part of his sermon, he adopted the precise line of argument employed by Dr Wiseman, in his volume published in the year 1836, and which consisted of lectures delivered at the English College at Rome. Following Dr. Wiseman, Dr. Pusey maintained, that on consecrating the elements of bread and wine, a change took place, into the mode of which it was presumptuous to inquire, but which we were to regard as a wonderful mystery, that it should be bread and wine, yet the very body and blood of Christ. In support of these statements Dr. Pusey quoted the language of the Council of Trent, Section xiii. c. 3 and 4. It may be remarked here, that Dr. Turton, the able and learned Dean of Westminster, in his work on the Eucharist, has ably criticised the principles of interpretation adopted by Dr. Wiseman, but of these criticisms Dr. Pusey took not the least notice.

The second part of the sermon was on the Communication of the Remission of Sins; and Dr. Pusey laboured to show, that "the Remission of Sins" referred not only to the atonement on the cross, by the one offering of the body of Christ, but also to the celebration of the Lord's supper; here again he quoted "Ancient Church," as authority. This doctrine is also maintained in Tract 90, this Tract asserting—"that there is nothing in the XXXI. Article against the mass in itself, or against its being an offering for the remission of sin, when considered as a continuation of Christ's sacrifice."—p. 63, first edition.

Consistently with these views, Dr. Pusey, in practically applying his subject, spoke of the Lord's Supper as the means of continuing and maintaining the spiritual life imparted in baptism; and urged to more frequent communion both on the part of "the Holy" and of Sinners; the former that they may enjoy an antepast of heaven; the latter, that they might, peradventure, obtain the remission of sins.

Professor Pusey's sermon was delivered to the Vice-Chancellor, who appointed a Board of Heresy to examine into the truth of the alleged charges. The members of the board were—The Vice-Chancellor; Dr. Faussett, Margaret Professor of Divinity; Dr. Ogilvie, Professor of Pastoral Theology; Dr. Hawkins, of Oriel College; Dr. Symons, Warden of Wadham, and the Rev. Dr. Jelf, Canon of Christ's Church; and it was said that the investigation had terminated in a complete vindication of Dr. Pusey, who has produced out of St. Cyprian the ipsissima verba of the passage which Dr. Faussett had accused of heresy. But the fact is, the board has condemned the sermon, and suspended the Regius Professor of Hebrew from the office of preaching within the University for two years.

Dr. Pusey has protested against this decision. He says that he had requested to be allowed a hearing, and that nothing has been pointed out to him in his sermon contrary to the formularies of the Church.

The autograph of Shakspeare, "affixed to a deed of bargain and sale of house in Blackfriars, purchased by him from Henry Walker, dated March 10, 1612, with the seals attached," was lately purchased at Evans's sale-room for the library of the city of London.

The following works have been published within the last month:—"The Stranger in India; or, Three years in Calcutta. By G. W. Johnson, Barrister."—"Memoirs of the Life and Correspondence of John Lord Teignmouth. By his son, Lord Teignmouth."—"Prison Sketches, comprising Portraits of the Cabul Prisoners. By Lieut. V. Eyre."—"Arts, Antiquities, and Chronology of Ancient Egypt, from Observations in 1839. By G. H. Wathen."—"Characters and Costumes of Affghanistan. Second Series. By Capt. L. W. Hart, and J. Atkinson."—"History of the British Empire in India. Vol. IV. By E. Thornton."

The following are nearly ready;—"Ceylon and its Capabilities. With Illustrations. By J. W. Bennett."—"Narrative of a Journey from Herat to Khiva, Moscow, and St. Petersburgh. By Capt. J. Abbott, Bengal Artillery."

COLONIAL.—The Right Hon. Sir C. T. Metcalfe, Bart., G. C. B., has been sworn into office, and received an address signed by 4,000 inhabitants of Montreal, from which we take the following extract:—"The histories of India and Jamaica record the eminently successful public services of your excellency; in them we read the honourable proof of your integrity, firmness, energy, and wisdom; and, under the guidance of an all wise Providence, we trust that the endowments of a mind so gifted will be exercised no less beneficially in the sphere of your present duty."

The Times correspondent observes—"The King and the Cabinet are unanimous in their view of the Spanish question, and in their resolve to crush the Regent by all means practicable, without suggesting a casus belli. The King first regarded, and his Ministers now regard, or affect to regard, the Regent of Spain as the instrument of England, and they are therefore determined upon his ruin, if it can be safely effected. The King's object is that about which I have trespassed on you scores of times—namely, to establish a species of Dictatorship in Spain. His Ministers would on their own account be only too happy to purchase popularity by contributing to substitute French for British influence in that country. These are the motives, and hence are they unanimous. A portion of their system for attaining their ends consists in directing the press against—who and what?—'the common enemy' (England). I will not fatigue you with the published proofs of that which I affirm. Any man who takes the trouble of reading the Paris papers, those especially under ministerial influence, will see in the direct, but more particularly in the indirect, attacks upon England and the Regent of Spain which they publish, incontestable evidence of the correctness of my assertion. This unworthy attempt will fail, however."

On April 13th, were married at Wilkes county, North Carolinas, by Elder Colby Sparks, of the Baptist church, Messrs. Chang and Eng, the Siamese twin brothers, to Misses Sarah and Adelaide, daughters of Mr. David Yeates, of Wilkes county, North Carolina.

The Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Alabama has decided that the marriage of a white man with an Indian woman, according to the forms and customs of the Choctaw nation, is void; that a civilised man is incapable of contracting marriage with a savage; and that their offspring is illegitimate, and cannot inherit.—London Mail.

FOREIGN MISCELLANEOUS.—The Emperor of Russia's projected visit to Poland is now postponed. Nevertheless, it is understood that the great plans of reform, relative to the internal administration of Poland, will be carried into execution, and that the Prince-Governor has received the Emperor's commands on the subject. Russia seems to be more and more intent on assimilating Poland to herself. Every trace of Polish nationality is gradually disappearing—as, for example, coins, weights, and measures. Strenuous exertions are made to give extension to the Greek religion at the expense of Catholicism. The clergy complain bitterly of this. As an evident proof of the progress which the Greek religion is making in Poland, it may be mentioned that this year the Easter festivals were celebrated in the same manner as those in St. Petersburgh.

The property left by Baron Stieglitz, the banker, who lately died at St. Petersburgh, is estimated at the enormous amount of 50,000,000 rubles (between 5,000,000*l.* and, 6,000,000*l.* sterling). He was a native of Hanover, where his elder brother, one of the most celebrated physicians in Germany, died a few years ago.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Right Hon. Frederick John, Earl of Ripon, her Majesty's Commissioner for the Affairs of India, in the room of William, Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci, deceased.

Mr. Gladstone has been appointed President of the Board of Trade, and been succeeded as Vice-President by Lord Dalhousie.

It is stated that Mr. James Weir Hogg, M. P. for Beverley, was offered the Vice Presidency of the Board of Trade, the appointment to which Lord Dalhousie has succeeded, but that it was declined, as acceptance would have necessitated a fresh election for Beverley. Mr. Hogg will, we hope, ere long, be one of the Secretaries to the India Board, in which case a seat in the East India Direction will be vacant.

On the 24th May a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when it was resolved that, in reference to the present state of the Council of India, the term of Mr. William Wilberforce Bird's tenure of his seat therein be extended for one year beyond the prescribed period; and it was also resolved that Mr. Frederick Millet be appointed a provisional member of the Council of India.

The London Missionary Society has determined on sending out twelve missionaries to China during the present year, for which purpose the sum of 8000*l.* has been already subscribed.

On Sunday, 28th May, collections were made in the churches and chapels of the metropolis, and throughout the diocese of London generally, in compliance with the wish expressed in the recent pastoral letter of the bishop to his clergy. The collection so made will be an annual one, that for the present year being applied to the formation of a fund for planting the church of this country in its newly-acquired territories on the coast of China. In the letter alluded to, his lordship remarked, that he trusted the collection might be of such an amount as to provide a competent maintenance not only for a missionary clergy, but also for a missionary bishop.

The Bishop of London also requested the clergy of his diocese to make known to their congregations, that the sums of money which may be collected, in consequence of his Pastoral Letter, for planting the Church of England in the British territories on the coast of China, will be applied by him to that purpose under such arrangements as may receive the sanction of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury.

We find the following in the Constitutionel:—"The Government, we are informed, has received communications from China, announcing that the Emperor has decided upon giving immediately free access to the French into his dominions, upon the same footing as the English. In consequence of this intelligence, a naval division is about to be sent into the Chinese seas, under the command of a Rear-Admiral, and, consequently, it will be composed of several frigates and other ships of war."

We find from the American papers that Mr. Everett having declined the mission to China, Mr. Cushing, the gentleman who was recently rejected by the Senate as Secretary of the Treasury, has been appointed by the President to fill the office, and will leave New York in the Brandywine frigate early in July. There is some difference of opinion as to the power of the President to make this appointment; and it will, probably, be the subject of a discussion during the next session of Congress; but it is equally probable that the power will be confirmed.

The General Meeting of the shareholders of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company, was held on 30th May, Sir J. Campbell in the chair. The Report read upon this occasion states that the receipts of the Company continue steadily to increase, and that a material diminution of expense has been effected for the last six months. The steamer Hindustan had been placed on her station in the Indian seas, after a voyage of 91 days, including stoppages, at a total expense, beyond the receipt of passage money of 1,800*l.*, and it was expected that a similar result would be obtained in the case of the Bentinck; thus, though the original estimate was 10,000*l.*, the directors confidently anticipate that both these ships may be placed on their station for 4,000*l.* The opening of the line to and from Calcutta, Madras and Suez, had been attended, as was anticipated, with an increase of passengers in the Company's Mediterranean steamers. The transit through Egypt is stated by the directors to have been, at no time since the establishment of the Company, on so satisfactory a footing. The Company have supplied means for improving the water conveyance on the Nile and Mahmoudieh Canal; and trust that the united efforts which have been lately made, will accomplish this important object, as they are assured of the continued countenance of the Pasha.
